Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, on that all I desire to say is that this section, when read in connection with section 3, requires a trial by court-martial before dismissing any midshipman for a single act of hazing. The sentence which I propose to strike out by the amendment is the last sentence of the section, providing that "no midshipman shall be dismissed for a single act of hazing, except under the provisions of section 3." Section 3 requires a court-martial. With this statement I leave it to the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Superintendent of the United States Naval Academy may, in his discretion and with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, cause any midshipman in the said academy to be tried by court-martial for the offense of hazing, as provided by the act approved June 23, 1874, and such court-martial, upon conviction, may sentence such midshipman to any punishment authorized by the said act or by the act approved March 3, 1903, or authorized for any violation or breach of the rules of the said academy by the said rules, or, in cases of brutal or cruel hazing may, in addition to dismissal, sentence such midshipman to imprisonment for a period not exceeding one year: Provided, That such midshipman shall not be confined in a military or naval prison or elsewhere with men who have been convicted of crimes or misdemeanors; and such finding and sentence shall be subject to review by the convening authority and by the Secretary of the Navy, as in the cases of other courts-martial.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment. I desire to amend section 3 by striking out all of section 3, commencing with the line 8, and for the following reasons.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Strike out all of section 3, commencing with line 8, on page 6.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, this portion of the section provides, in addition to dismissal, that a cadet can be punished by twelve months' confinement, and then follows this proviso:

That such midshipman shall not be confined in a military or naval prison, or elsewhere, with men who have been convicted of crimes or misdemeanors.

Now, if you can not confine him in a military or naval prison with people who have been convicted of crimes or misdemeanors, where are you going to confine him? It means, if it means anything, solitary confinement. It certainly was not the purpose of the committee to provide that this cadet should be punished for twelve months in solitary confinement. He is not to be confined in a military or naval prison with anybody guilty of a crime or misdemeanor, and they are about the only people who are put in prison. It means, if it means anything, that the cadet must be subjected to solitary confinement.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] if he was not present when the Secretary of the Navy was interrogated upon this point, and he said there was ample opportunity to imprison him as such court-martial should direct without sending him to a military or naval prison, to be there associated with enlisted men who had been convicted of crime?

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York tell me where the Secretary said he could confine a man, if not in the prisons referred to?

Mr. VREELAND. He could send him on board any one of our ships of war. He said to the committee, without going into it at length, that there was ample opportunity to imprison all of these cadets that were likely to be sentenced to imprisonment by a court-martial under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. RIXEY. It seems to me, then, according to the contention of the gentleman from New York, that if this cadet is not subject to solitary imprisonment he is to be given an excursion for twelve months.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia if it is not true that the Santee is a ship in which boys are imprisoned for violations?

Mr. RIXEY. I suppose the people there confined are guilty to some extent of misdemeanors, and if so, the cadet under sentence for hazing could not be confined with them.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a good deal has been said here to-day about the traditions of the Naval Academy being somewhat responsible for the existence of the practice of hazing, and a member of the committee has referred to the fact that the practice of hazing prevails even in the House of Representatives, because the Committee on Appropriations has been hazed by somebody upon the minority side. I think, Mr. Speaker, that tradition has something to do with that, because it seems to me that all along down the line there are illustrious examples. The President of the United States hazes the Senate, the Senate hazes the Speaker, the Speaker hazes the Committee on Rules, the Committee on Rules hazes the majority, the majority hazes the minority, the minority hazes the Committee on Appropriations, and the Committee on Appropriations hazes the poor, unfortunate Department clerks. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is an endless chain, is it not?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes; an endless chain. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it is time for Congress to haze the officers of the Naval Academy. The trouble at the Naval Academy is not altogether due to the boys over there. In the act of 1903 it was specifically provided that the Superintendent of that academy should prescribe rules for the suppression of this evil, but to this day the mandate of that law has not been obeyed. The petty officers, the higher officers, the disciplinary officers, have winked at the violation of this law, and the Superintendent of the academy to this hour has never issued any command to the cadets over there that it should be obeyed.

If those petty officers were required to do "stunt No. 16" until they got out of the academy it might have a happy effect. If the disciplinary officers were required or compelled to perform the "double hypotenuse" that is mentioned in the report of this committee, and that seems so popular at Annapolis, it might have a happy effect. If the Superintendent of the academy was required "to sit upon infinity" as these boys have been required to do at the command of the bullies of the higher classes, hazing in the Naval Academy would stop. It is supreme nonsense for intelligent Members of this House to say that the authorities at Annapolis can not suppress hazing. They can. The trouble has been that they have not wanted to suppress it. Gentlemen complain of the condtion at this time and say that the law has not been effective. It has not been effective because the authorities there have not attempted to enforce it until within recent months. What is the condition now? We have the statement of this distinguished subcommittee that made the investigation there that hazing is a thing of the past, that it has been suppressed. What suppressed it? The fact that outraged public sentiment has compelled the officials there to enforce the law. The fact that the boys recognize that there is a sword hanging over their heads is what has done it. Now it is proposed to modify the law that has destroyed the practice. This bill, instead of being entitled a bill having for its purpose the suppression of the practice ought to be entitled a bill to encourage the practice of hazing, because that will be the result. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I think the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, if it prevails, would destroy somewhat the harmony of this bill. Section 1 provides that it shall be the duty of the Superintendent of the United States Naval Academy whenever he shall believe the continued presence of any midshipman at said academy to be contrary to the best interests of the service to report to the Secretary. Then the Secretary is required, after careful consideration, to call upon the young gentleman who has been aspersed by the Superintendent for his views upon the subject as to whether or not he ought to be punished, and if the Secretary, after carefully considering all that the young gentleman has to offer, should conclude that he ought to be dismissed, then he may approach the President of the United States, and if he can secure in writing the assent of the President of the United States, the efforts of these three gentlemen conjointly urged may result in the dismissal of this fellow from the academy. If it was not for the respect due this presence and this distinguished committee, I would say that that provision was assinine. To pass a little further. Section 3 provides that the Superintendent of the United States Naval Academy may, in his discretion and with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, call a court-martial before which this young gentleman may appear, and if he is convicted of a brutal assault, of cruel hazing, he can not be discharged from the academy, because that is not the second offense.

He has got to be a brute twice; he has got to be cruel twice; he has got to violate the statutes of the United States twice; he must assert his superiority over the Congress and over the law twice; he must trample upon the statute, refuse obedience, be insubordinate to discipline twice before you can get rid of him, and then after the second offense and after he has been convicted of this brutality, of this cruelty, of this double violation of the statutes, then in tenderness for somebody he must not be confined with ordinary criminals. Oh, no. Those guilty of misdemeanors, those guilty of crime, must not be with this gentleman. They might contaminate him, or is it in tenderness for the other criminal that you refuse to allow this close association in criminality? [Applause.] I do confess I do not understand exactly what it means. I remember not long ago reading something in the newspapers of the action of a military court-martial. A private had stole a pair of gauntlets and he was sentenced to a year's confinement in a military prison. Now, who are you tender about? That man who was guilty of this trifling offense or this other fellow who is guilty of this double offense, of this brutality, of this cruelty, of this assertion that he will not submit to discipline, that he will not be obedient to the law, that he will not fit himself for the future discharge of duties in disciplining other men that may later on come upon him. I would like for the gentleman to explain who it is they are so solicitous about, the man who is guilty of this double offense, who has twice been convicted by a court-martial, or this boy who may have stolen a pair of gauntlets. Now, Mr. Speaker, if you were to strike out this provision it would destroy the harmony, if I may say it again, of asininity that is to be found in the various sections of the bill. [Applause.]

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the offense of "hazing," as mentioned in this act, shall consist of any unauthorized assumption of authority by one midshipman over another midshipman whereby the last-mentioned midshipman shall or may suffer or be exposed to suffer any cruelty, indignity, humiliation, hardship, or oppression, or the deprivation or abridgment of any right, privilege, or advantage to which he shall be legally entitled.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out the words "unauthorized assumption of authority," in the seventeenth and eighteenth lines, and inserting in the seventeenth line the word "act" and in the eighteenth line the word "toward," so as to read: "That the offense of hazing as mentioned in this act shall consist of any act by one midshipman toward another midshipman whereby the last-mentioned midshipman," etc. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what offenses this act covers as it is drawn?

Mr. VREELAND. I do not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. PALMER. I would like to ask the gentleman what offenses you think this act covers as it is drawn?

Mr. VREELAND. Section 4?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. VREELAND. My understanding, Mr. Speaker, is, under the present law upon the statute books relating to the academy at Annapolis, there is ample provision for the punishment of all offenses against good order and the commission of all crimes except hazing. Hazing is an offense which does not prevail throughout the United States unless, perhaps, in the House of Representatives, as stated this afternoon. It is peculiar to the naval school, and we believe that the offense of hazing as described in this act can not be treated by the ordinary court. Take the Kimbrough case. The man who hazed Kimbrough did not threaten him, he did not lay his finger upon him, and yet the boy was hazed and nearly lost his life. Now, in answer to the question I will say that our understanding is that all of the offenses to which he refers are now already upon the statute books——

Mr. PALMER. What is the sense in making a distinction between two kinds of brutality? Under this act an offense can not be committed unless it is preceded by "an unauthorized assumption of authority." You say that the Branch and Meriwether case would not come under the act——

Mr. VREELAND. Not at all.

Mr. PALMER. Now, I want to ask this question: Suppose a number of first-class men should take an under-class man and duck him in a pond; would that come under this act?

Mr. VREELAND. Not under this act, but it could be tried under other acts, depending upon the offense for which he was tried.

Mr. PALMER. Suppose a number of first-class men should order a fourth-class man to do something—say, bring an apple to their rooms. That would be "an unauthorized assumption of authority" if it was done.

Mr. VREELAND. That would be hazing, under the definition now given.

Mr. PALMER. If the fourth-class man did not do it and was ducked in a pond, that would be hazing under this act. In the one case the ducking in the pond would be under the act, and in the other case it would not be under the act. The point I make is this: That this act is not effective unless cruelty and degradation, or whatever you please to call it, is preceded by "an unauthorized assumption of authority." If you adopt this amendment, when one cadet interferes with another and subjects him to humiliation or cruelty, he will be under this act, and all offenses will be covered by it.

Mr. VREELAND. The trouble with the amendment of my friend from Pennsylvania is he is attempting to put in this section, which provides specifically for hazing, other offenses which are now clearly provided for in the law, and for which punishment is provided in the statute books.

Mr. PALMER. What is the difference between brutality, such as ducking a man in a pond and making him stand on his head, when it is preceded by "an unauthorized assumption of authority" and when it is not? Why should not all be put in under the act?

Mr. VREELAND. If one man falls on another and half kills him with his fist, that is assault and battery, and he can be prosecuted under the law. This case of Kimbrough is about the only one where great brutality was shown in all this hazing, and yet I doubt if the man who did that could be convicted in any court in this country.

Mr. PALMER. They are to be naval officers in the service of the Government, responsible for the nation's defense and the nation's honor. Anything that tends to brutalize or reduce their respect for the authority of the law, or to encourage lawlessness, is hurtful to their usefulness as officers and subversive of the discipline which is essential to efficient service.

I am therefore in favor of any legislation that will curb the undue manifestations of exuberant boyish spirit when exercised in directions that humiliate and disgrace their fellows, and also of severe remedies to check such exhibitions of brutality and cruelty as the evidence in the recent court-martial cases at Annapolis has disclosed. A system which tolerates such abhorrent methods is hateful to all honorable men who love justice and hate oppression.

Mr. Speaker, the method of appointing midshipmen brings together boys from every rank of life. The President, who appoints midshipmen at large, and habitually selects sons of naval officers or Army officers, may be expected to make large claims to social superiority. Some Congressmen appoint sons of friends, others open the appointment to a competitive examination and appoint the boy best qualified physicially and intellectually, without respect to station in life, religion, race, or politics. This method brings together a heterogeneous mass, possessed of the most diverse views of life and social relations. They come from the classes and the masses; but they are all the wards of the nation, being educated at the expense of the nation, and should stand on a plane of perfect equality. Nothing could be more subversive of good order and necessary discipline than to allow any claim of superiority on the part of any midshipman or any number of midshipmen over his or their fellows.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa rises to oppose the amendment.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, some years ago I was called upon to write on the subject of the life of Gen. Frederick Steele, who was a classmate of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant. In doing that I took occasion to look up the cases of demerit of all the same class at West Point, and I want to read for the benefit of this House the record of Ulysses S. Grant, who afterwards became a General of the Army.

Mr. PALMER. What has that to do with my amendment?

Mr. LACEY. It illustrates the subject of demerits, and shows that that system was not such a great test after all. Here is what I found on the subject of Grant's demerits. In his first year he had 59 demerits, the second year 58, the third year 74, and in the fourth year 44, aggregating 235. He was within 15 demerits of the dismissal point that was suggested here in a proposed demerit system. Fifteen more would have taken him out of the service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is the gentleman citing that as a precedent that should be followed?

Mr. LACEY. I was citing it as illustrating what a showing might afterwards be made by a boy who had a great many demerits at West Point. This shows that Grant had 235 demerits during his time at West Point.

Mr. JAMES. Is there any record of those who were dismissed?

Mr. LACEY. I will read you the names of those who were his classmates or who served with him in the classes above or below him during his four years at West Point.

The names of many of his associates at the academy have since been entered upon the immortal pages of history. Among the names of the young men with whom he served I found the following: William T. Sherman, Frederick Steele, Stewart Van Vliet, George H. Thomas, Horatio G. Wright, Amiel W. Whipple, T. J. Rodman, A. P. Howe, Nathaniel Lyon, George Stoneman, W. G. Peck, Alfred Pleasonton, William F. Smith, Fitz-John Porter, Henry Coppee, John W. Davidson, Delos B. Sackett, DeLancy Floyd Jones, Gordon Granger, D. A. Russell, John G. Foster, D. N. Couch, Jesse L. Reno, George H. Derby (famous as "John Phoenix"), George B. McClellan, J. P. Garesche, John F. Reynolds, Joseph J. Reynolds, Don Carlos Buell, William S. Rosecrans, John Pope, Abner Doubleday, Rufus Ingalls, Fred T. Dent, I. P. Quinby, W. B. Franklin, John Newton, J. J. Peck, J. A. Hardee, C. C. Augur, W. S. Hancock, C. S. Hamilton, George Sykes, and in this immortal list is Hiram Ulysses Grant. Some of these men preceded Grant and Steele in their entry at the academy, others entered while they were there and graduated later, but they wore all schoolmates.

Grant's name got changed on the roll as Ulysses S. Grant. His demerits did not put him out of the academy.

Mr. PALMER. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether he is in favor of my amendment or against it?

Mr. LACEY. All this simply shows that demerits at West Point do not necessarily disqualify a boy from being efficient thereafter. You will all concede that Grant made great atonement for any of his shortcomings at the Military Academy.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of every professor, assistant professor, academic officer, or instructor, as well as every other officer stationed at the United States Naval Academy, to promptly report to the Superintendent thereof any fact which comes to his attention tending to indicate any violation by a midshipman or midshipmen of any of the provisions of this act or any violation of the regulations of the said academy. Any naval officer attached to the academy who shall fail to make such report as provided in this section shall be tried by court-martial for neglect of duty and if convicted he shall be dismissed from the service. Any civilian instructor attached to the academy who shall fail to make such report as provided in this section shall be dismissed by the Superintendent of the academy upon the approval of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to amend section 5, after the word "Academy," in line 2, page 7, by inserting the words "or any class officer."

Page 7, line 2, after the word "Academy," insert "or any class officer."

Mr. HEPBURN. The object of this amendment is to impose upon the class officer the burden and duty of reporting offenses. Is not the idea that the gentleman has in mind conveyed in line 24 of the preceding page, where it says:

Every professor, assistant professor, academic officer or instructor, as well as every other officer.

"As well as every other officer stationed at the United States Naval Academy."

Now, I assume that the law would be construed to mean those officers of the Navy who are thereby detailed. I want to include in this provision the officers of the various classes. I may not have the names right. Just give me the proper designation, if I have not got it right.

Mr. WEEKS. Cadet officer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa modifies his amendment. The Clerk will report the modification.

Insert the words "or any cadet officer."

Mr. HEPBURN. I think that will be efficient.

Mr. VREELAND. You do not mean cadet officers, do you? you mean naval officers?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; not naval officers; but there are cadet officers there, are there not, known by that name?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is right. They are the class officers.

Mr. GREGG. They are called "cadet officers" and "cadet petty officers." You had better put both expressions in.

Mr. HEPBURN. If I may be permitted I will again modify my amendment so that it will read: "or any cadet officer or cadet petty officer."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment as again modified by the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "academic officer," insert "or any cadet officer or cadet petty officer."

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if it would not be better to put his amendment after the word "instructor," in line 24 of page 6? That would bring his designation in with the other officers and other professors named therein.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will again ask the indulgence of the House to insert the amendment after the word "officer," in line 24 of page 6.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman again asked to withdraw his amendment and to renew it. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, in line 24, after the word "officer," insert "or any cadet officer or cadet petty officer."

Mr. GREGG. Should not the same words be inserted also on page 7, line 6, after the word "officer?"

Mr. HEPBURN. I intend to offer it there if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question for the information of Members of the House. As I understand, the law has been changed so that the word "midshipman" has been substituted for "cadet" in the academy. I should like to know whether these officers now referred to are called "cadet officers" since the change in the law providing that cadets shall be called "midshipmen?"

Mr. VREELAND. I refer to the company officers appointed out of the first class at the Naval Academy. As I understand, they are known as "cadet officers."

Mr. MANN. Are they still known as "cadet officers" since the change of the word "cadet" to "midshipmen?"

Mr. VREELAND. I understand they are still called "cadet officers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask to amend line 6, on page 7, by inserting, after the word "officer," the words "cadet officers or cadet petty officers."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "officer," in line 6, page 7, insert "cadet officer or cadet petty officer."

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that in perfecting this bill this amendment would be going entirely too far. Anyone referring to the language will find that the requirement is to report not only with reference to hazing, but any violation of this act or any regulation of the academy.

Now, the boy occupying a petty office in the academy, if he fails to report any violation of the law, any violation of any regulation of the academy, is liable upon conviction of that to dismissal. Upon conviction, according to this, if the amendment be adopted, he shall be dismissed. You provide that he shall not be dismissed necessarily for a trifling act of hazing, and then provide that he shall be dismissed for failure to report the most trifling violation of a regulation. I certainly hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the motion whereby the amendment just before this was agreed to. The same reasons that apply to this last amendment applies to the other one.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to reconsider the vote by which the prior amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa was agreed to.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is mistaken about the effect of this. The objection raised by the gentleman from Missouri was to the punishment. The punishment in this section would apply if the second amendment had been adopted. But as it now stands, if there is a disobedience and failure upon the part of a cadet officer to report, then some other punishment under the rules would be adopted.

Mr. BONYNGE. The naval officer would be dismissed.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; but the other would be punished in some other way. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion for reconsideration.

The SPEAKER. The hour of 4.30 o'clock having arrived, under the special order the previous question operates upon the bill and amendment to its final passage. The only amendment pending is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] in the nature of a substitute, which amendment has already been reported. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment of the committee as amended was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes had it.

A division was demanded by Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN.

The House was dividing when Mr. KITCHIN withdrew the demand for a division.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. VREELAND, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BILLS OF LADING BY INTERSTATE CARRIERS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the reprint of the bill (H. R. 15846) relating to bills of lading issued by carriers for the interstate transportation of property and to certain obligations, duties, and rights in connection therewith.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill H. R. 14171, an act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I move that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. SMITH of Iowa, Mr. KEIFER, and Mr. FITZGERALD.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 15848. An act authorizing the sale of timber on the Jicarilla Apache Indian Reservation for the benefit of the Indians belonging thereto; and

H. R. 12845. An act to consolidate the city of South McAlester and the town of McAlester, in the Indian Territory.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 1056. An act granting a pension to Galon S. Clevenger;

H. R. 9216. An act granting an increase of pension to Catharine R. Mitchell;

H. R. 4736. An act for the relief of the county of Custer, State of Montana;

H. R. 13194. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to reclassify the public lands of Alabama;

H. R. 16381. An act leasing and demising certain lands in La Plata County, Colo., to the P. F. U. Rubber Company; and

H. R. 15583. An act to authorize the Madison Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River in St. Francis County, Ark., at or near the town of Madison, in said county and State.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 5181. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Snake River between Whitman and Columbia counties, in the State of Washington—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 5182. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River between Franklin and Benton counties, in the State of Washington—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 5183. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River between Douglas and Kittitas counties, in the State of Washington—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 5184. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River between Walworth and Dewey counties, in the State of South Dakota—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 5204. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Yellowstone River in Montana—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 5211. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Snake River at or near Lewiston, Idaho—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. POLLARD, by unanimous consent, was given indefinite leave of absence, on account of important business.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next, at 12 o'clock meridian.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communication was taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the chairman of the Printing Investigating Commission, transmitting a preliminary report—to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MORRELL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9329) to amend an act approved February 28, 1903, entitled "An act to provide for a union station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2563); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14578) to provide for the establishment of a public crematorium in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2565); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PEARRE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15910) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners," approved June 21, 1902, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2566); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. EDWARDS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16390) granting a pension to Katharine Partridge, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2496); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SULLOWAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3689) granting an increase of pension to Charles W. Lyons, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2497); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

RAILROAD RATES IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I present to the Senate and desire to have read a communication addressed to me personally, but as it relates to the great subject with which we are dealing and the abuses of railroad rates, I wish it to be given to the Senate, largely in response to the suggestion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], who remarked Friday that he would like to have me give the country something of this sort every morning. I intend to gratify him. This is the first installment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the communication sent to the desk.

The communication was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

CLARKSBURG, W. VA., March 17, 1906.

Hon. BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: On account of your able and fearless advocacy of the rights of the people of West Virginia as against the railroad combination in this State, West Virginians look upon you as a greater friend to them than either of their Senators. I have read excerpts from your report on the Hepburn railroad rate bill concerning West Virginia with great interest, and having heretofore made investigation as to the laws and legislation in West Virginia with respect to relief for individual operators, I shall attempt to give you partial results of my investigation, in hopes that it may aid you in your work in trying to get better railroad facilities for the farmers and individual operators who desire to mine and ship their coal from this State.

This question is not new to me. Living in the section that I do, I have had application after application of individual operators for relief against discrimination as to the shipment of coal by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. And I have found the situation to be almost hopeless, under our present laws, to coal shippers that do not stand in with the railroad company.

The constitution of West Virginia, I think, is broad and comprehensive enough to permit legislation adequate to the needs of our people. Here are its provisions:

"ARTICLE XI.

"SEC. 9. Railroads heretofore constructed, or that may hereafter be constructed, in this State are hereby declared public highways and shall be free to all persons for the transportation of their property thereon under such regulations as shall be prescribed by law; and the legislature shall, from time to time, pass laws applicable to all railroad corporations in the State, establishing reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freights and providing for the correction of abuses, the prevention of unjust discriminations between through and local or way freight and passenger tariffs, and for the protection of the just rights of the public, and shall enforce such laws by adequate penalties.

"SEC. 11. No railroad corporation shall consolidate its stock, property, or franchise with any other railroad owning a parallel or competing line, or obtain the possession or control of such parallel or competing line, by lease or other contract, without the permission of the legislature."

But for some reason our State legislature has enacted no laws sufficient to have these constitutional provisions carried into force and effect. As to section 11 above quoted, there is not a line of legislation enacted in this State that I have been able to find. In the north eastral part of West Virginia new lines of railroad have been built purporting to compete with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and the Parkersburg branch of the Baltimore and Ohio—at least that was the claim when the rights of way were obtained and the roads were being built—such as the West Virginia and Pittsburg, the M. & R., the West Virginia Short Line, in the immediate section of Clarksburg, and the Ohio River Railroad along the Ohio River. Rights of way were obtained for almost nothing, and the people assisted in every way to get the roads for the purpose of competition only to have them swallowed up by or turned over to the same system and used, so far as the coal trade is concerned in this section, almost exclusively for the Fairmont Coal Company and its interest, the Fairmont Coal Company being controlled by the same people that control the railroads, whether it be called the Baltimore and Ohio system or the Pennsylvania system, or the two combined.

Why the legislature has never taken up this constitutional provision and given to the governor or some other tribunal created for the purpose authority to prohibit the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company from owning or operating competing lines, such as above mentioned, I am unable to tell, but no such legislation has been enacted nor authority vested in anyone to enforce this constitutional provision.

Now, if we look to see what relief, if any, the legislature of West Virginia has given to the people, under section 9 of Article XI of the constitution, above quoted, all that we find is in chapter 54, section 66b, of the code of 1899, acts of the legislature, 1895, chapter 16, which is as follows:

"I. It shall be unlawful for any railroad corporation to engage, directly or indirectly, in the business of buying and selling coal or coke, or to promise, pledge, or lend its credit, money, or other property or thing of value to another, either natural or corporate, engaged in such business, but nothing herein shall prevent such corporation from purchasing such articles for its own consumption, or, when it is the owner of any such commodities, from selling and shipping the same: Provided, In doing so such corporation shall not discriminate in rates, distribution of cars, or otherwise against other shippers of like commodities on its lines: And provided further, That when such company has the right to sell either of such commodities and is unable from any cause to fill any bona fide contracts it may have made to supply such commodities, or either of them, it may purchase them to enable it to fill such contracts.

"II. Every railroad corporation along whose line of railroad the industries of mining coal or manufacturing coke is carried on shall without discrimination between or amongst shippers, and without unnecessary delay, make a reasonable provision for the transportation of all such coal and coke offered for transportation over its railroad, and no such railroad corporation shall discriminate in rates, distribution of cars, or otherwise against or amongst shippers of coal or coke offered for shipment on its line or lines.

"III. The circuit and criminal courts of every county through or into which the railroad of any such railroad corporation violating any or either of the provisions of this act may pass shall have concurrent jurisdiction of all the offenses under and violations of the provisions of this act.

"IV. Any railroad corporation or officer or agent thereof who shall knowingly and willfully violate any of the provisions of this act shall for each and every such offense be deemed guilty of misdemeanor, and upon indictment and conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $50 nor more than $500."

To my mind, if the railroad presidents, with their eminent legal counsel surrounding them, should be allowed to draft a bill for the legislature—and perhaps they drafted this one or had control of those who did—they never could have drafted a measure that would better "seem to have had that which it hath not" than this act. The "but" and "provided" clauses in subsection 1 takes every bit of the force out of that section except as to rate discrimination and distribution of cars, which is provided for in subsection 2. The provision in subsection 4 as to indictments and conviction are such that the railroad company can almost laugh at the prosecution in trying to convict any railroad official under that provision. The railroad official must "knowingly and willfully violate the provisions;" then, when he is convicted, the fine is not less than $50 nor more than $500. What does a railroad company care for such fine as that? And, besides, the case can be carried to the Supreme Court and dallied with until the remedy is absolutely futile.

Now, when we turn for relief, under subsection 2, for individual operators or shippers, we find that there is no remedy provided, and the mode of procedure that we have in this State would be by mandatory injunction on behalf of the individual operator to compel the railroad company to cease discrimination as to cars or rates and make reasonable provisions for the transportation of coal. When we tell our clients the remedy, they throw up their hands and say that they can not afford to combat the railroad company in a proceeding of that kind; that it would be fought to a bitter end, the railroad company using every means that it could to prevent a conclusion or final hearing of the cause, and in the meantime would entirely ruin them. The railroad company, being interested in the production of coal itself, refuses to furnish cars when an individual operator has miners or men to dig the coal, and watches when the miners leave, and then furnishes a supply of cars. The operator can not load them, as his men are gone, and by the time he gets his miners back the cars are removed, because not filled. Spotters are out for the railroad company to ascertain the condition of the individual operator, and every means used that can be studied up and devised to prohibit him from operating his mines. If he should furnish his own cars, when they are shipped to market loaded with coal the empties would be used by the railroad company and all the delay possible made in their return. When coal is shipped to a foreign market, instead of the loaded cars being properly delivered the tip is given to drop them off here and there and scatter them around, so that the coal does not get to market at the time that it should, and the individual shipper loses his sale by not being able to deliver his coal. These are only a few of the ways in which the railroad companies harass the individual shipper.

Last fall I thought I would apply to the attorney-general of this State, asking him to take the matter up in relation to the individual shippers, but upon examination I found that his powers were so limited that it would be useless to apply to him. At page 838 of the Code of 1899 will be found his duties, which are as follows:

"1. The attorney-general shall give his opinion and advice in writing whenever required to do so by the governor or other officers at the seat of government or by the board of public works.

"2. He shall appear as counsel for the State in all cases in which the State is interested depending in the supreme court of appeals or in the circuit court of the county in which the seat of government may be.

"3. He shall annually, on or before the 1st day of November, deliver to the governor a report of the state and condition of the several causes, in which the State is a party, pending in the said courts.

"4. On the final determination of any cause in either of the courts mentioned in the second section in which the attorney-general appeared for the State, the clerk thereof shall certify to the auditor the fee of the attorney-general which was taxed in the bill of costs against the defendant, and in case the said fee shall be paid into the treasury the auditor shall issue his warrant on the treasury in favor of the attorney-general for the amount thereof.

"5. It shall be the duty of the attorney-general of this State to appear and protect the interests of the citizens of this State in all actions, suits, and other proceedings that are now, or shall hereafter be, instituted in any court of record in this State in favor of or against any railroad company whose road passes through any portion of the territory of this State whenever such action, suit, or proceeding involves the right to assess or collect taxes upon the property, real or personal, of said railroad by any authority in this State authorized to levy taxes, whenever said attorney-general shall be requested by said authority to do so; for which appearance and services he shall receive a reasonable fee, to be paid by the authority requesting his appearance as aforesaid. But no compensation shall be paid him therefor by the State, except his salary and actual traveling expenses incurred."

It can be readily seen that there is no authority given the attorney-general to take the initiative or institute any proceeding against the railroad company for discrimination in cars or rates. And the only place that he is authorized to appear is when indictments are found against the companies for such discrimination. If there were vigorous prosecution in every county in the State through which the railroads run, wherein the discrimination law has been violated, it might have some effect upon the railroad companies, but the individual operators would have to be the prosecutors and the railroad companies would still be inclined to treat them worse on account of the prosecutions.

After finding that it would be useless to apply to the Attorney-General, I then thought of the governor of the State, and upon investigation I found that it was as equally hopeless, on account of there being no legislation for the purpose, to ask the governor to do anything until the legislature acted. The authority of the governor in this particular is found in the State constitutional provision, section 5 of Article VII:

"The chief executive power shall be vested in the governor, who shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

This constitutional provision has been construed by our supreme court, in the case of Shield & Preston v. Bennett, Auditor (8 W. Va., p. 74), at point 13 of the syllabus, as follows:

"This provision does not generally, if ever, make it the duty of the governor himself to execute the laws; but, as the language implies, it makes it his duty carefully to observe the manner in which the different officers of the government exercise their proper functions and execute the laws committed to their charge, or their failure to perform such duties, and when they fail, if he has the power to remove them from office, in a proper case to remove them, or to bring the subject to the cognizance of that department of the government which has the power to remove or punish the delinquents."

So that it will be seen that the governor is not required to take the initiative or institute the proceedings in behalf of individual operators, but is only required to see that the prosecuting attorneys and other officials do their duty in respect to carrying out these laws.

This leaves us with some legislation, but inadequate to afford anything like relief under our present situation. The only hope we have is to look now to the United States Government, through Congress and the Interstate Commerce Commission. When the next State legislature meets (and Governor Dawson is contemplating calling an extra session for the purpose) we may be able to get some legislation on the subject. We may never expect, however, to get anything like proper railroad legislation so long as the stupefic pass influence is given to officials either in whole or broken doses.

I hope that the time will soon come when the moral sense of the people in this country will be so quickened that every official—United States, State, county, and district—who rides upon a free railroad pass will be looked upon and stamped as a bribe taker and a villain, and given no more credit than a ballot-box stuffer, a ravisher, a thief, or a robber.

The United States should take upon itself the burden and expense, as it is now trying to do, to compel common carriers of interstate commerce to cease discrimination. And the State of West Virginia should enact such laws, and use its power to enforce them, that will compel common carriers to do equal justice with all shippers and not leave this burden upon the individual operator or shipper. Every corporation that is granted the right of public domain should be by the power of the State and at the expense of the State compelled to deal fair with every citizen of the State. We have reached a point in the history of this country, by allowing the corporations to encroach on us to such an extent, that we shall be compelled to enact legislation that will seem drastic to those who have encroached upon the rights of the people to such an extent that it has become unbearable. The railroad companies should be compelled to sell their coal, if not, it should be taken by the State or the United States Government.

Mr. Bond, one of the vice presidents of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, in his report to the United States Senate, admits that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company owns the majority of the stock of the Consolidated Coal Company of Maryland, and the Consolidated Coal Company of Maryland owns a majority of the stock of the Fairmont Coal Company. Some years ago the Fairmont Coal Company bought out nearly all the operating mines in this valley between Morgantown and Weston, and undertook to squeeze out all the individual operators who would not sell out to them or who afterwards opened up mines. I submit that the Consolidated Coal Company of Maryland and the Fairmont Coal Company are both unlawful combinations in restraint of trade, and both should be compelled to disband. The Fairmont Coal Company pays its leading officers enormous and outrageous salaries, such as the men to whom such salaries are paid could never hope to get in the open market and from individuals or corporations in which they were not in control. And the manner in which the company is otherwise managed is such that if individual operators were given an equitable chance as to transportation the Fairmont Coal Company could not begin to compete with them.

Your efforts have already done us much good, and I sincerely hope, yes, I know, that your future work will still add to your usefulness as a United States Senator and work a great benefit not only to our section, but to the whole United States.

Sincerely, yours,

MILLARD F. SNIDER.

P. S.—If you will send me a copy of the Hepburn bill and your report thereon I shall be very much obliged.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND THE DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. PLATT. I am directed by the Commission appointed during the last Congress to investigate public printing to submit a preliminary report. I ask that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator from New York in this connection if there are not two joint resolutions to accompany the report?

Mr. PLATT. There are. I shall present them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is a very important matter, and I will ask that the report just submitted be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the report just made by the Senator from New York be read for the information of the Senate. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report.

Mr. GALLINGER. My purpose in asking for the reading of the report was to have it brought to the attention of Senators, because I feel sure that it is one of the most important reports which has been presented to Congress for many years. Having accomplished that purpose by a partial reading of the report, I ask that the remainder of it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the entire report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Printing Investigation Commission, after entering actively upon the duties imposed upon it by Congress in the act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, soon discovered, as other similar commissions have previously discovered, the subject of reform in the public printing and binding to be one of such magnitude and complexity as to require almost scientific treatment, and to involve many months of investigation and research. Yet, the necessity for reform in the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents is so pressing that the Commission has deemed it in the public interest to present to Congress, at this time, a preliminary report dealing with some of the more glaring inequalities and abuses which call for immediate correction, and, at the same time, to embody in the form of joint resolutions a remedy therefor.

DISTRIBUTION.

The investigations of the Commission have disclosed one of the chief inequalities of the existing printing laws to consist of faults in the distribution of public documents. This grows out of two glaring defects in the law; first, the fact that all publications are printed to the full limit authorized by law; second, that so far as the Congressional distribution is concerned, documents are distributed through the Senators and Representatives on a pro rata basis without regard to the demands there may be from their respective constituencies.

As many copies of a report on the beet-sugar industry will be placed at the disposal of a Member of Congress representing a district in the heart of the city of New York as are placed to the credit of a Member representing a beet-sugar district in California; a Member representing an agricultural district in Kansas is called upon to distribute as many copies of a report on the marble industry of Vermont as a Representative of the latter-named State; a Member representing a constituency in North Dakota is called upon to distribute as many copies of a report on citrus fruits as a Member from Florida, and a Member representing the Long Island (New York) district has placed to his credit the same number of copies of a report on irrigation of arid lands as the Member from Nevada.

This system operates practically in the following way: The Representative of the district in the heart of the city of New York distributes but a small fraction of his documents relating to beet sugar; the Representative from Kansas distributes but a small fraction of his documents relating to the marble industry; the Member representing a district in North Dakota distributes but a small fraction of his documents relating to the culture of citrus fruits, and the Member from the Long Island district likewise disposes of but a small fraction of the documents to which he is entitled in relation to the irrigation of arid lands.

In the meantime, the Member from California, the Member from Vermont, the Member from Florida, and the Member from Nevada have exhausted their quotas of these reports, and, while their constituents express to them an urgent need for copies of these publications, they can not gracefully ask Congress for a reprint while tons upon tons of undistributed copies, to which they have no access, lie molding in the document rooms and warehouses of the Government. Hence there are piled up in the folding rooms and other auxiliary warehouses vast quantities of public literature for which no use can be found under present methods of distribution, and under said methods of distribution there is no possible relief that can be afforded without a too radical change of system.

In many instances Senators and Members, seeing upon the list of documents placed to their credit many which would be of little or no interest to their constituents, send them out with no incentive to or opportunity for discrimination rather than permit them to rot or become obsolete. The Kansas farmer who receives a report on the marble industry of Vermont charges his Senator or Member with ill judgment and Congress with extravagance, thereby bringing the entire question of the public printing into disrepute.

The New York dry goods merchant likewise who receives a report on the Devonia paleontology perchance throws the document into the waste basket and stands ready to indorse any proposition looking to the abolishment of the Government Printing Office. The alternative of this would be that the document would fail to be sent out and would rest in the cellar of the Capitol, for it would require a force of many clerks to effect an intelligent distribution of all the documents placed to the credit of any single Senator or Representative, as there is no State and no district in which there exists legitimate demand for all the documents placed to the credit of their Representatives.

If a method can be devised whereby a Senator or Member may supply to his constituents the documents in which they are interested to the full extent contemplated by Congress in the printing of such documents, and yet avoid the unnecessary printing of documents for which his constituents have no use, no hardship will be visited upon anyone, and, at the same time, a real saving in the cost of printing can be effected.

A private publisher, anticipating a maximum demand for 100,000 copies of a book to be printed, and a minimum demand of 10,000 copies, would confine the first edition to the requirements of the minimum rather than the possible maximum demand, fully aware that if his fondest anticipations were to be realized he could meet the larger demand by the printing of subsequent editions. For this reason books printed at private expense often run through many editions.

There is no valid reason why Congress can not pursue the same policy, especially in view of the costly experience through which Congress has already passed and the exhibition it has witnessed of waste and extravagance, having few parallels in the administration of public affairs. It is not extravagant to state, since it is practically true, that there are now stored in the Government warehouses 9,538 tons of public documents, most of which are obsolete, and this regardless of hundreds of tons that have been sold in past years to dealers in junk.

Under the present system, if 150,000 copies of a document are ordered to be printed, they are delivered to the folding rooms of the Senate and House in bulk, and allotted under prevailing custom in the proportion of 50,000 to the Senate and 100,000 to the House. These are prorated among the Senators and Members and placed to their credit accordingly on the books of the folding rooms. When a Member from California orders a copy it is taken from the same pile from which a copy would be delivered to a Member from Maine. It should be distinctly borne in mind that the allotment to the individual Member is simply a book record, and the pile is diminished only to the extent that individual Members draw therefrom. If, now, the pile can be originally made smaller and replenished as the necessities of the folding room may require, and the production of printed matter, in other words, kept more nearly on a parity with the demand, a solution of the problem will be reached.

An analogy would be found in a bank holding $5,000,000 on deposit received from 5,000 different depositors. The bank, of course, would not divide its $5,000,000 into 5,000 parts and hold the whole sum intact to be drawn upon by its depositors, but would simply retain such proportion of the whole, based upon past experience, as would satisfy the checks of depositors as presented for collection. The book records of the depositors would show $5,000,000 as being due them, while the bank actually would retain but a fraction for their depositors' immediate use.

The plan of the Commission would contemplate the delivery to the folding rooms of any given document in a number sufficient to meet the calls of Senators and Members, based upon the experience of the said folding rooms in meeting similar demands in the past. If the demands exceed the expectations of the folding rooms a means is provided under the plan of the Commission whereby the supply could be made to approach these demands, and at the same time that the supply should cease when the demand ceases. The policy would be to meet the actual, rather than the possible, demand, and would be always subject to the limitations now fixed, unless Congress, by subsequent legislation, should see fit to provide otherwise.

The Joint Committee on Printing, with the assistance and cooperation of those officers of Congress charged with the duty of making the distribution, would aim to ascertain in advance of the publication of any document what the probable requirements in its distribution would be, and to supply, if deemed expedient, only a limited edition of the whole number authorized by law, to be followed by a subsequent edition, if necessary, to maintain a supply equal to the legitimate demand.

If the plan recommended by the Commission should be adopted, the Joint Committee on Printing could place upon the officers charged with distribution the responsibility for excessive accumulation of documents in the folding rooms, as the committee would naturally rely for its estimates upon the judgment and experience of those charged with the distribution.

For instance, the superintendent of the folding room of the House, under date of December 5, 1905, reports on hand 2,598 copies of Commercial Relations, 1901, showing a manifest oversupply of this document, although many Members have drawn their full quota. It would be a simple matter for the superintendent of the folding room, in advance of the printing of the next issue, to take into account the number of undistributed copies of previous reports and to estimate therefrom the probable demands upon his office for the proposed issue, in order that the Joint Committee on Printing may limit the first edition of such subsequent publication to the probable demand, and thereby save the enormous cost of printing copies which, in the light of past experience, will probably never be distributed. The theory is just as susceptible to practical application as the law of averages applied to the great commercial interests of the world, and to the entire scope of appropriations based upon estimated receipts which underlie all governmental operations.

One of the serious problems that has confronted Congress has been a suitable provision for the storing of public documents. The superintendent of the folding room of the House, the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and the superintendent of documents of the Government Printing Office have all complained of their lack of storage capacity. Such complaints would cease if the proposed plan were adopted, since the unnecessary accumulation would be obviated by permitting these officers in advance of printing to express the actual needs of the two Houses of Congress.

While the printing of a document in more than one edition would necessarily involve a slight additional expense, the estimates furnished to the Commission by the Public Printer show this additional cost to be so trivial compared with the great economy following the proposed reduction in the volume of printing as to be unworthy of consideration. For instance, there were printed of the annual report of the Commissioner of Education for 1902, 38,689 copies, at a cost of $63,248.96. There are now in the folding rooms of the Senate and House 9,483 sets, or 19,136 volumes, undistributed, and for which there will be in the future little, if any, demand. These undistributed copies cost the Government, aside from the cost of plates (typesetting, stereotyping, etc.), $11,758.92. The estimated cost of printing this report in two editions instead of one would have been only $150 additional, showing a net saving on this one report of $11,608.92.

There were printed of the Annual Report of the Geological Survey, 1902-3, 13,680 copies, at a total cost of $12,032.98. There are now undistributed in the Senate and House folding rooms 4,121 copies, which cost the Government, aside from the making of the plates, $3,393.19. The cost incident to printing this report in two editions instead of one would have been only $125, a net saving of $3,178.19.

There were printed of the Special Report on Diseases of the Horse 200,642 copies, at a cost of $100,862.75. There are now in the folding rooms of the Senate and House 70,094 copies, costing, exclusive of cost of plates, etc., $33,645.12. The cost of printing in two editions instead of one would have been only $600, showing a net saving of $33,045.12.

There were printed of the proceedings in the Senate incident to the Impeachment of Judge Swayne 10,642 copies, at a total cost of $5,729.90. There are now on hand in the folding rooms of the Senate and House 7,100 copies, for which there will probably be no future demand. The cost of these undistributed copies, exclusive of typesetting, etc., was $2,769. The additional cost incident to the printing in two editions instead of one would have been only $85, showing a saving of $2,684.

To illustrate this principle by application to a proposal now before Congress, quite parallel to the publication of the Swayne impeachment proceedings, a resolution is pending which provides for the printing of 10,000 copies of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and a digest of said testimony. Each set comprises seven volumes, making a total of 70,000 volumes. The estimated cost of this publication is $26,922. It is quite probable that the demand for these hearings, after the existing wave of public interest has receded, will cease as surely as the interest in the Swayne impeachment proceedings subsided, and, in the judgment of the Commission, the printing of 5,000, or even 4,000, copies will meet all the requirements. If the plan proposed by the Commission were now operative, a very large saving could be effected and, at the same time, the quota of no Senator or Member who might require his full quota would be disturbed in the slightest degree.

The bound edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress aggregated 13,300 sets, or 93,100 volumes, costing $122,323.69. There remain in the folding rooms of the Senate and House 8,795 sets, or 61,565 volumes, costing the Government $76,340.60. The additional cost of printing the bound edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the aforesaid session in two editions instead of one would have been only $1,225, showing a net saving of $75,115.60.

This does not take into account the large number of copies sent out by the Superintendent of Documents and by many Senators and Members without assurance that they were either desired or appreciated.

The slight additional expense incident to printing in two or more editions instead of one, to which allusion has been made, would, in the judgment of the Commission, be completely offset by the facility afforded the Public Printer in economically arranging and distributing his work.

Under the plan proposed by the Commission no Senator or Member will receive any smaller number than now of any document whatever, if he desires them for distribution. The plan simply prevents the surplus printing which follows a uniform and arbitrary supply to all Senators and Members of all documents, regardless of their demands or requirements.

It is not contemplated by the Commission that the policy of printing in two or more editions, instead of one, shall apply to all publications. In fact, many reports printed as mere leaflets can be printed to the full number authorized at but small expense; but with reference to all important and expensive publications there should be careful regard for the probable demand.

ALLOTMENT OF APPROPRIATIONS.

In the general annual and deficiency appropriations for printing and binding for Congress and the Executive Departments for the last fiscal year there was carried $6,081,395.82. Of this amount, $2,745,750 was allotted to the Departments and $3,335,645.82 was allotted for the printing and binding for Congress.

Upon this showing Congress stands charged with spending more money for printing than is expended by all the Departments and Independent offices of the Government combined. This showing is not only erroneous, but conceals one of the chief sources of extravagance. Under the system in vogue, all reports to Congress from the various Executive Departments, bureaus, and independent offices of the Government are printed as Congressional documents and charged to the allotment for printing and binding for Congress.

This constitutes by far the largest part of the public printing aside from blank books and stationery. The appropriations for printing and binding for the Executive Departments, bureaus, etc., are not drawn upon in the printing of these reports and documents which are now charged to the Congressional allotment for printing and binding. It follows, as a matter of course, that in the compilation of these documents and reports there is an absence of the restraint which would exist if the Department from which the publication emanated were required to draw from an appropriation definitely made for the printing of that Department.

Over the appropriation or allotment to a Department stands the head of that Department, with power and authority to protect the allotment against encroachment by any of its bureaus at the expense of others, and to check any tendency toward extravagance. There is no officer of the Government who stands in this relation to the Congressional allotment with power of veto upon extravagant tendency. But under the plan of the Commission the necessity which now exists of appropriating blindly will be changed in the respect that the Departments will include in their estimates the probable cost of all their publications. The very necessity for scrutiny by Congress over the estimates of the Departments and the coequal necessity of scrutiny by the Departments themselves in estimating will impel a curtailment of unnecessary appropriation. The difference will be tantamount to that between a guess and a practical certainty.

As it stands, the Congressional allotment for printing and binding constitutes a common fund from which all Departments and independent offices reporting to Congress may draw. The Congressional allotment must needs be sufficiently large to-day to meet the capacity of all without discrimination or limitation. This system affords no incentive to brevity, condensation, elimination, or economy in illustration. For example, in one of the Departments during the last fiscal year the reports charged to the Congressional allotment amounted to $139,764.63; in another it amounted to $451,605; in another it amounted to $256,678, and in another it amounted to $49,982.

In the preparation of the reports and documents involving these and other enormous expenditures, amounting in all to $1,206,088.44, Congress per se had no voice whatever. In the examination of witnesses this Commission made particular inquiry of the officials of Executive Departments charged with the responsibility of the preparation of these documents and reports as to their knowledge of and familiarity with the cost of publication of these documents; and while they appeared to be entirely familiar with the cost of publication of documents printed under their own allotments they, in many instances, displayed a complete lack of knowledge of the cost of that portion of their printing which was charged to the Congressional allotment in the preparation of which they were immediately concerned.

In one case a bureau chief was asked to state the cost of printing the publications of his bureau for the last fiscal year, for the preparation of which he was personally and directly responsible. After some hesitation he was finally induced to attempt to guess at the amount. His guess was 40 per cent of the actual expenditure, the actual expenditure being about $190,000. The bulk of this expenditure was drawn from the Congressional allotment. In the various reports submitted to the Commission, in response to an inquiry addressed to the Executive Departments under date of March 10, 1905, some of the Departments were unable from their own data to supply the Commission with information covering the cost of their own publications, aggregating millions of dollars, but paid for out of the appropriation for printing and binding for Congress.

On the face of the record the printing of documents for a certain Executive Department in the last fiscal year amounted to $236,214.75 only, while the actual cost of the publications of this Department amounted to $492,889.45. The cost of printing of documents for another Department, on the face of the record, was only $207,963.71, whereas the actual cost was $654,914.71, the difference being the amount paid for the printing of the documents of those departments out of the appropriation for Congressional printing.

The Commission believes that in many instances expensive printing has been embodied in reports to Congress without serving any useful end and for no other purpose than to escape the cost of typesetting, etc., and illustration, which would have otherwise been charged against the allotment to the Department or bureau from which such matter emanated. This belief is strengthened by the fact that the total number of reprinted pages obtained from these plates in the last fiscal year exceeded the total number of pages in the original editions, some parts of the originals being used in more than one subsequent departmental publication.

The total number of pages in the original editions of departmental documents charged to Congress in the last fiscal year amounted to 89,482. The number of pages reprinted from the said plates, as nearly as can be determined, amounted to 93,874, the reprints exceeding the originals by 4,392 pages, which shows that the departmental allotments were protected at the expense of the Congressional allotment to the extent of the enormous expense involved in the typesetting, etc., of this number of pages, the burden of the cost thereby falling upon Congress.

To correct these conditions and to check this tendency to extravagance in the public printing, the Commission proposes that the Congressional allotment of appropriations for public printing shall be charged only with its pro rata share of the expense of these publications, based upon the number of copies actually furnished to Congress for distribution, regardless of the cost of typesetting, stereotyping, and illustration, and that the Executive Departments, bureaus, and independent offices from which the reports and documents emanate shall be charged with the cost of plates and illustrations plus their proportionate share of the cost of printing, based upon the number of copies distributed by them.

For the information of Congress and the guidance of the Committees on Appropriations there is submitted with this report a detailed statement showing, by Departments and bureaus thereof and independent offices of the Government, the cost of all departmental publications paid for out of the Congressional allotment during the past fiscal year, from which a readjustment of the appropriations for printing, to meet the conditions proposed, may be readily arrived at.

It is the confident belief of the Commission that the adoption of this policy will result in a closer scrutiny by the responsible heads of the Departments and bureaus of the matter presented to Congress to be printed and will place responsibility for extravagance upon those who possess the power to correct that condition.

The general annual and deficiency appropriations for printing and binding for Congress and the Executive Departments for the last fiscal year, as has been said, amounted to $6,081,395.82. The general opinion prevails that this covers the entire cost of public printing for that period. The Commission has found, however, that $1,051,860 in addition to this sum was specifically appropriated for printing in connection with other items of legislation. The Commission would recommend that, in so far as practicable, all appropriations for printing and binding shall hereafter be made collectively.

The Commission is further of the opinion that the Public Printer should be placed in the same relation to Congress and the Executive Departments that a private printing establishment bears to its customers. The Public Printer should be required to keep an accurate account of the actual, rather than the theoretical, cost of all work performed in his Office, charging to Congress or the Executive Departments, who are virtually his customers, an amount only sufficient to cover such cost. Congress and the Departments, on the one hand, watchful of their appropriations, would naturally scrutinize the items of cost involved in their printing, while the Public Printer, on the other hand, would be subject at all times to the necessity of verifying, with business precision, the accuracy of his charges. To effect this reform it would be necessary to place at the disposal of the Public Printer a fund sufficiently large to maintain his Office and meet its operating expenses as any printing establishment would require, pending the receipt of returns for work actually performed.

This system would involve, in the selection of a Public Printer, careful consideration of those qualities of executive and administrative ability which insure successful management of similar institutions in the field of private enterprise. It would operate conservatively in limiting the Public Printer to the application of the funds placed at his disposal to the specific purposes for which they were intended by Congress, rather than, as under the present system, making available for his use without restraint or supervision, other than a belated public sentiment, all unexpended balances of appropriations made under current methods, a power which, in the hands of an unscrupulous or incompetent official, would tend to extravagance, if it did not lead to censurable results.

J. B. PERKINS.
J. M. GRIGGS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report, in the absence of objection, will be printed, as requested by the Senator from New York, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PLATT. From the Committee on Printing I report a joint resolution to prevent unnecessary printing and binding and to correct evils in the present method of the distribution of public documents, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. HALE. Let the joint resolution be read, and then, with the consent of the Senator from New York, I would be glad to have the matter go over until to-morrow. It is a very important subject; a great deal of money is being spent uselessly, and I for one should like to be able to examine the report in full. I ask that the joint resolution may go over after having been read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution (S. R. 43) to prevent unnecessary printing and binding and to correct evils in the present method of distribution of public documents was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 43) to prevent unnecessary printing and binding and to correct evils in the present method of distribution of public documents.

Resolved, etc., That the Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized and directed to establish rules and regulations, from time to time, which shall be observed by the Public Printer, whereby public documents and reports printed for Congress or either House thereof may be printed in two or more editions, instead of one, to meet the public requirements: Provided, That in no case shall the aggregate of said editions exceed the number of copies now authorized or which may hereafter be authorized: And provided further, That the number of copies of any public document or report now authorized to be printed or which may hereafter be authorized to be printed for any of the Executive Departments, or bureaus or branches thereof, or independent offices of the Government may be supplied in two or more editions, instead of one, upon a requisition on the Public Printer by the official head of such Department or independent office, but in no case shall the aggregate of said editions exceed the number of copies now authorized or which may hereafter be authorized: Provided further, That nothing herein shall operate to obstruct the printing of the full number of any document or report, or the allotment of the full quota to Senators and Representatives, as now authorized or which may hereafter be authorized, when a legitimate demand for the full complement is known to exist.

Mr. PLATT. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report a joint resolution to correct abuses in the public printing and to provide for the allotment of cost of certain documents and reports.

The joint resolution (S. R. 44) to correct abuses in the public printing and to provide for the allotment of cost of certain documents and reports was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 44) to correct abuses in the public printing and to provide for the allotment of cost of certain documents and reports.

Resolved, etc., That hereafter, in the printing and binding of documents or reports emanating from the Executive Departments, bureaus, and independent offices of the Government, the cost of which is now charged to the allotment for printing and binding for Congress, or to appropriations or allotments of appropriations other than those made to the Executive Departments, bureaus, or independent offices of the Government, the cost of illustrations, composition, stereotyping, and other work involved in the actual preparation for printing, apart from the creation of manuscript, shall be charged to the appropriation or allotment of appropriation for the printing and binding of the Department, bureau, or independent office of the Government in which such documents or reports originate; the balance of cost shall be charged to the allotment for printing and binding for Congress, and to the appropriation or allotment of appropriation of the Executive Department, bureau, or independent office of the Government, in proportion to the number delivered to each; the cost of any copies of such documents or reports distributed otherwise than through Congress or the Executive Departments, bureaus, and independent offices of the Government, if such there be, shall be charged as heretofore: Provided, That on or before the 1st day of December in each fiscal year each Executive Department, bureau, or independent office of the Government to which an appropriation or allotment of appropriation for printing and binding is made shall obtain from the Public Printer an estimate of the probable cost of all publications of such Department, bureau, or independent office now required by law to be printed, and so much thereof as would, under the terms of this resolution, be charged to the appropriation or allotment of appropriation of the Department, bureau, or independent office of the Government in which such publications originate shall thereupon be set aside to be applied only to the printing and binding of such documents and reports, and shall not be available for any other purpose until all of such allotment of cost on account of such documents and reports shall have been fully paid.

This resolution shall be effective on and after July 1, 1906.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely desire to reenforce the request of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that the two joint resolutions may go over until to-morrow and then be taken up on the request of the Senator from New York, for present consideration. I should like to express the hope that Senators will take the trouble to read the very able report which accompanies the joint resolutions, and which has been ordered printed in the RECORD. I think if any Senator will take the trouble to read that report he will see the necessity of the immediate passage of the joint resolutions.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that this matter ought to be thoroughly and carefully looked into. But that Senators may have time enough to examine his question with care, I hope it will not be called up to-morrow. I for one desire to do so, because I regard it as a very important matter, and it ought to be early considered.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Iowa, after reading the report is not satisfied, I certainly hope it will be carried forward further, but I do not think that after he has read the report he will have any doubt that the joint resolutions should be passed.

Mr. ALLISON. The only thing I suggest is that we shall have an opportunity to examine this matter, which may be done by to-morrow. I desire time enough, and of course to-morrow may give time enough to read the report.

Mr. LODGE. It is only half a dozen pages long.

Mr. ALLISON. There are also extracts from the testimony. This matter has been gone into very thoroughly elsewhere, and I should like to see what has been done there.

Mr. LODGE. The Commission has been engaged on this work for about six months.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. LODGE. I was not on the Commission.

Mr. ALLISON. I know the Senator was not. Neither was I. But I want time enough to have the matter thoroughly understood by Senators who are interested in it.

Mr. HALE. Let the matter, as it is understood, go over until to-morrow, and then if the Senator from Iowa desires more time to examine it that can be readily acceded to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Or any other Senator.

Mr. HALE. Or any other Senator. Everyone will see when he reads the report that we ought to act pretty soon upon it. We can settle all that to-morrow morning. The report will appear in to-morrow morning's RECORD, and we can settle it to-morrow.

Mr. TELLER. I have not been able to hear exactly what the understanding is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request was that the joint resolutions just reported by the Senator from New York from the Committee on Printing should lie over until to-morrow. The joint resolutions will go to the Calendar.

Mr. TELLER. That is the proper course.

SURVEY OF PASSAIC RIVER, NEW JERSEY.

Mr. KEAN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made a survey and examination of the Passaic River, New Jersey, beginning at the Montclair and Greenwood Lake Railroad bridge to the present head of navigation at the city of Passaic, with a view to providing suitable navigation facilities for the needs of the city of Passaic.

PUBLIC HEALTH AND MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the morning business is closed.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4250) to further enlarge the powers and authority of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and to impose further duties thereon.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, on page 1, line 8, after the words "points on," to strike out "the seacoast" and insert "or near the coast lines;" on page 2, line 3, after the word "thereof," to insert "not used by the Government for other purposes designated by law;" and on page 3, line 2, after the words "delivered to the," to strike out "Surgeon-General" and insert "Secretary of the Treasury for the use;" so as to make the section read:

That as soon as practicable after the approval of this act the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall select and designate suitable places for quarantine grounds and anchorages for vessels, at such points on or near the coast lines of the United States as, in his judgment, are best suited for quarantine grounds and anchorages and necessary to prevent the introduction of yellow fever into the United States. That in cases in which the title to the land and water so selected and designated is in the United States it shall be the duty of the Department, bureau, or official of the United States having custody or possession of such land and water, or any part thereof, not used by the Government for other purposes designated by law, on demand of the Secretary of the Treasury, to deliver the same into his custody and possession for the use of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, evidencing such delivery by a suitable instrument in writing to be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury. That in cases in which the title to such land and water, or any part thereof, is in any other owner than the United States it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to secure the title and possession of the same to the United States for the use of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States, by purchase at a reasonable price, if possible; but if in his judgment the price demanded for such property be excessive, he is hereby authorized to apply to the Attorney-General of the United States to cause to be instituted, in the proper tribunal, condemnation proceedings in the name of the United States for the purpose of acquiring for the United States the title and possession of such land and water, and said Attorney-General shall, as soon as possible after such application by the Secretary of the Treasury, cause such proceedings to be instituted and conducted to a conclusion, and the custody and possession of such land and water, when duly acquired in accordance with the award made in such condemnation proceedings, shall be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury for the use of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

The next amendment was, in section 2, on page 3, line 17, after the words "United States," to strike out "Provided, That in cases in which the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service is already in possession of and is operating and conducting a quarantine ground and anchorage the notice required by this section shall not be necessary" and insert "and upon plans and estimates of cost to be first approved by the Secretary of the Treasury;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That on acquiring possession of any land and water selected and designated by him as quarantine ground and anchorage it shall be the duty of the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to cause to be published at least once a week for four consecutive weeks, in a newspaper published in the port nearest such proposed quarantine ground and anchorage, a notice of such selection and designation, with a description of the boundaries of such quarantine ground and anchorage, and shall forthwith establish within such boundaries a quarantine ground and anchorage, with such appliances and facilities as he may deem necessary to prevent the introduction of yellow fever into the United States, and upon plans and estimates of cost to be first approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The next amendment was, to strike out section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. That whenever, in his judgment, it is necessary for the security of any portion of the seacoast of the United States on the Gulf coast that includes more than four ports of entry against the introduction of yellow fever, a quarantine station and anchorage of refuge shall be established whereto infected vessels, or vessels having on board any person with yellow fever bound for any such ports, may be sent, and whereat such vessels may be detained for the purpose of being disinfected, having their cargoes disinfected and discharged if necessary, and their sick treated in hospital until all danger of infection or contagion from such vessels, their cargoes, passengers, or crews has been removed, it shall be the duty of the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to select and designate a suitable location for such a quarantine station and anchorage of refuge at a point reasonably accessible to vessels destined to that part of the seacoast of the United States for the greater protection of which it is deemed necessary to establish such quarantine station and anchorage of refuge. That such quarantine station and anchorage of refuge shall have a safe anchorage for vessels of 25 feet draft of water, and shall be distant not less than 35 miles from any port or subport of entry of the United States. And if it shall be necessary, in the judgment of said Surgeon-General, for the protection of any other port or ports on the coast of the United States that additional quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge shall be established he shall, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, designate such quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge at such places as shall comply as nearly as practicable with the requirements as to depth of water, distance from ports or subports of entry, and safety of anchorage as prescribed in the foregoing provisions. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to acquire title and possession, for the use of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, of any quarantine station and anchorage of refuge duly selected and designated, in the manner and by the proceedings authorized and required in section 1 of this act for acquiring title to and possession of quarantine grounds and anchorages. That, on acquiring possession of any land and water selected and designated by him as a quarantine station and anchorage of refuge, the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service shall, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, cause to be published in four such newspapers as he may think proper, once a week for three months, a notice of such selection and designation, together with such rules and regulations as with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury he shall adopt and promulgate, requiring vessels with yellow fever among their passengers or crew to go to such quarantine station and anchorage of refuge, to be dealt with there, before visiting any port of the United States; and he shall immediately proceed to establish at such point a quarantine station and anchorage of refuge with facilities for disinfecting vessels and their cargoes, treating in hospital the sick among their passengers and crews, providing for the separation of those among their passengers and crews who are well from those who are suffering from yellow fever, and for doing all things necessary to eradicate such disease from such vessels, their cargoes, passengers, and crews.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, as soon as practicable after the approval of this act, to establish on one of the islands of the group known as the Dry Tortugas, at the western end of the Florida Reef, a quarantine station and anchorage of refuge, whereto infected vessels having on board any person with yellow fever and bound for any port of the United States may be sent for the purpose of being disinfected, having their cargoes disinfected and discharged if necessary, and their sick treated in hospital until all danger of infection or contagion from such vessels, their cargoes, passengers, or crews has been removed. And it shall be the duty of the Department, bureau, or official having the custody or possession of said Tortugas Islands, on demand of the Secretary of the Treasury, to deliver the possession of said islands to the Department of the Treasury, for the use of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service as provided in this act. And if it shall be necessary, in the judgment of said Surgeon-General, for the protection of any other port or ports on the coast of the United States that additional quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge shall be established, he shall, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, designate such quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge at such points as will afford safe anchorages for vessels detained thereat and as will be sufficiently distant from ports or subports of entry of the United States to render danger of infection impossible. That on acquiring possession of said Dry Tortugas or any other locality, in accordance with the provisions of this act, for the purpose of establishing thereat a quarantine station and anchorage of refuge, the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service shall, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, cause to be published in four such newspapers as he may think proper, once a week for three months, a notice of the selection and designation of such places for quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge, together with such rules and regulations, in conformity with the requirements of this act, as with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury he shall adopt and promulgate, requiring vessels with yellow fever among their passengers or crews to go to such quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge, to be dealt with there before visiting any port of the United States. He shall establish at such quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge all necessary instrumentalities for disinfecting vessels and their cargoes, shall erect the necessary hospital buildings, and install the necessary furniture and fittings for receiving and treating the sick among the passengers and crews of vessels going to such quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge, and provide for the separation of those among their passengers and crews who are suffering from yellow fever from those who are in good health, and shall further provide for doing all things necessary to eradicate such disease from such vessels, their cargoes, passengers, and crews.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, on page 8, line 20, after the words "United States," to strike out:

But nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any vessel or any person released from quarantine detention by authority of said Surgeon-General to enter any State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, against the expressed objection of the lawful health authorities of such State, Territory, or District: Provided, That no vessel released from quarantine detention by authority of said Surgeon-General shall be liable for any quarantine fees or charges by any State or municipal authority.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have the control, direction, and management of all quarantine grounds and anchorages and of all quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge established by authority of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 9, after the word "officers," to strike out "trespassing or otherwise;" so as to read:

SEC. 5. That any vessel, or any officer of any vessel, or other person other than State health or quarantine officers, entering within the limits of any quarantine grounds and anchorages, or any quarantine station and anchorage of refuge, or departing therefrom, in disregard of the quarantine rules and regulations, or without the permission of the officer in charge of such quarantine ground and anchorage, or of such quarantine station and anchorage of refuge, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to arrest, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $300 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, on page 11, line 3, after the words "five hundred thousand dollars," to insert "in addition to any sum now available for the purpose;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That from and after the approval of this act the salary of the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service shall be $7,000 per annum, payable monthly. That the sum of $500,000 in addition to any sum now available for the purpose is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid on the requisition of the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, as well as for the purpose generally of preventing the importation of yellow fever into the United States, and for the further purposes, in cooperation with the State health authorities, of eradicating it should it be imported, of preventing its spread from one State into another State, and of destroying its cause wherever the same may be found.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I now ask that the bill may go over, in order that it may be printed so that we may see how it stands as it has been amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection to the further consideration of the bill is made, and it will lie over.

Mr. BACON. I based my request upon the desire, as I have stated, that the bill may be printed as amended before we are called upon to act upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been printed as amended.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; it has been printed as amended.

Mr. BACON. I did not know that fact. I have not had an opportunity to examine the bill, and I should like to see it as it has been amended.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to say to the Senator from Georgia that the bill has had very careful examination in committee.

Mr. BACON. I have not urged any objection to it. I simply stated that I have not had an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. SPOONER. Then let the bill go over, without losing its place.

Mr. BACON. I do not desire it to lose its place at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

LIFE-SAVING STATION NEAR NEAH BAY, WASHINGTON.

Mr. PILES. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (S. 5026) providing for the construction and equipment of a first-class life-saving ocean-going tug, also a launch tender to be used in connection therewith, for service on the north Pacific coast of the United States.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized to establish a life-saving station at or near Neah Bay, in the State of Washington, at such a point as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend, said station, in addition to the usual equipment, to be supplied with two self-righting and self-bailing lifeboats.

SEC. 2. That for use in connection with said life-saving station there shall be constructed a first-class ocean-going tug, for service in saving life and property in the vicinity of the north Pacific coast of the United States, which said tug shall be equipped with wireless-telegraph apparatus, surfboats, and such other modern life and property saving appliances as may be deemed useful in assisting vessels and rescuing persons and property from the perils of the sea.

SEC. 3. That for the operation of said tug the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to employ a proper crew, including the necessary officers, engineers, firemen, etc., and the vessel shall be under the control and direction of the keeper of the life-saving station hereby authorized to be established.

SEC. 4. That to carry into effect the provisions of sections 1 and 2 of this act, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for the establishment of a life-saving station at or near Neah Bay, in the State of Washington, and for the construction of a first-class ocean-going tug to be used in connection therewith, for life-saving purposes in the vicinity of the north Pacific coast of the United States, etc."

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14171) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. PERKINS, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. DANIEL were appointed.

PUNISHMENT FOR HAZING AT NAVAL ACADEMY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3899) granting authority to the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to dismiss midshipmen from the United States Naval Academy and regulating the procedure and punishment in trials for hazing at the said academy, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof a substitute.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. HALE, Mr. DICK, and Mr. TILLMAN were appointed.

ESTATE OF GOTLOB GROEZINGER.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. LODGE. The regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order, and the first bill will be stated.

The bill (S. 1668) for the relief of the administrator of the estate of Gotlob Groezinger was announced as the first bill in order on the Calendar, and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to its consideration.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "back," to insert "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to refund and pay back, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to E. A. Groezinger, administrator of the estate of the late Gotlob Groezinger, the sum of $1,047.60, taxes collected upon 1,164 gallons of grape brandy which had been destroyed by fire in the distillery of said Gotlob Groezinger.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEASES IN THE YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

The bill (S. 4433) to amend an act approved August 3, 1894, entitled "An act concerning leases in the Yellowstone National Park" was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar, and was read.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the great Yellowstone National Park is an immense domain, separated, kept distinct for the benefit of all the people and for generations to come. I look with some apprehension upon every encroachment on that national domain in the way of selling or leasing parts of it. There seems to be no limitation in this bill as to the extent to which this process shall go on. The lease is confined to 20 acres, while my impression is that heretofore the limitation in each case has been, if not up to the present time, it was at one time, 10 acres. The experience the Government has had in allowing special sites to be selected has not been very satisfactory. If power is given to pick out, without limit as to the number of sites—and there is no limit here—20 acres, a very considerable tract, in any part or all parts of this great national park, the traveler, the tourist, the visitor is likely to find in a few years the very best parts of the park taken up under these leases and taken up in places which will affect the comfort and pleasure of the visitors who go there, as they will hereafter, by tens and hundreds of thousands. I do not see any reason why the limit in each case should be extended beyond 10 acres. In order to erect an inn, a place of public entertainment, a resort, 10 acres is ample, and I see no reason why it should be expanded.

Then if the bill is to be considered to-day for action I shall move——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I suggest to the Senator that this bill relates to a portion of Montana embraced in the national park. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] is absent from the Chamber, and as he is thoroughly familiar with this question, I suggest that the bill go over.

Mr. HALE. I think that is right. He ought to be here when the bill is considered.

Mr. LODGE. It should go over without prejudice.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It should be allowed to retain its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. HALE. The bill relating to the Yellowstone Park, which was under discussion, has gone over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar. Let me understand what that implies. If the bill goes over without prejudice, it ought to remain on this Calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. HALE. If you segregate, as I see somebody has done, all bills that go over without prejudice, you constitute another class of bills, and they do not go over without prejudice. If a bill goes over without prejudice, it ought to retain its place right in the Calendar, with its old number, and should not go on a new list. I see somebody has got a list here of bills "passed over without prejudice under Rule VIII." They are prejudiced, because they are put in another class.

Mr. SPOONER. They ought not to be.

Mr. HALE. They ought not to be.

Mr. SPOONER. That is with prejudice.

Mr. HALE. That is with prejudice.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. HALE. That puts it in another class. I do not know who did it. Nobody in the Senate ever directed that it should be done.

Mr. SPOONER. A bill ought to keep relatively the same position.

Mr. HALE. The same place. I suggest that hereafter, when a bill goes over without prejudice, it keep its place on the Calendar with its number, and that the bills which some one has put in another list be restored to the old list. Otherwise, instead of a bill going over without prejudice, it goes over, as the Senator says, with prejudice. I hope the clerks will make that correction.

Mr. LODGE. There ought to be only two classes——

Mr. HALE. Two subdivisions.

Mr. LODGE. One under Rule VIII and one under Rule IX.

Mr. KEAN. I think most of these bills did go over with prejudice.

Mr. LODGE. Then it ought to be so stated.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. As I have understood, it is merely the insertion of the words "Point reached under Rule VIII when last under consideration." I had not understood that the bills under that head were in any different position on the Calendar, but that that particular phrase was used to indicate the point last reached.

Mr. HALE. But when we go back to the Calendar, as was proved this morning, we do not take up that other list. We go on and complete this list, and those bills which have been passed over without prejudice are prejudiced, because we never reach them.

Mr. LODGE. They are never announced, and you have to make a special motion to get them off the list.

Mr. HALE. Yes. The old-fashioned method is good enough.

Mr. LODGE. They can be kept under Rule VIII and marked "Passed over."

Mr. HALE. Yes; let the clerks see to it; and I suggest that hereafter take liberty with the Senate list of Calendars. The old way is pretty good, and I suggest that the old method be restored.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the next bill be announced.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has gone over without prejudice, which the Chair understands is equivalent to retaining its place on the Calendar. The next case on the Calendar will be stated.

SEALERS OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill (H. R. 4463) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 2, so as to read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the sealer of weights and measures shall give bond to the District of Columbia in the penalty of $5,000, with two sureties or with the guaranty of a bonding company, to be approved by the Commissioners, conditioned on the faithful discharge of the duties of his office, and shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation before the Commissioners that he will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of his office, which bond or guaranty and oath shall be deposited with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIGHTS OF WAY THROUGH PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill (S. 3743) to amend an act entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875, was announced as the next bill in order on the Calendar.

Mr. TELLER. I do not see present the Senator who reported the bill. I do not know just what the effect of the bill is, except that it is an amendment of the act of 1875. I should like to have it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie over.

Mr. LODGE. Without prejudice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without prejudice.

SARAH E. BAXTER.

The bill (S. 4623) for the relief of Sarah E. Baxter, executrix of the last will and testament of Warren S. Baxter, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Sarah E. Baxter, executrix of the last will and testament of Warren S. Baxter, deceased, late of Lewis and Clarke County, Mont., $200, being the amount paid by him in his lifetime to the United States for the south half of the southwest quarter of section No. 5, township No. 10 north, range 3 west, Montana meridian, which was erroneously sold to him by the Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MOVEMENTS OF VESSELS IN VIRGINIA WATERS.

The bill (S. 4774) relating to the movements and anchorage of vessels in Hampton Roads, the harbors of Norfolk and Newport News, and adjacent waters, in the State of Virginia, was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. At the request of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], who is absent, let the bill go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESA VERDE NATIONAL PARK.

The bill (S. 3245) creating the Mesa Verde National Park was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar, and was read.

Mr. TELLER. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

EASTERN STAR HOME FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (H. R. 13842) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate The Eastern Star Home for the District of Columbia," approved March 10, 1902, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LORENZO A. BAILEY.

The bill (S. 3139) for the relief of Lorenzo A. Bailey was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. LODGE. Let the bill go over.

SALE OF COAL IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (H. R. 4470) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 12 of the act so as to read:

SEC. 12. That no person shall sell or deliver any coal or coke within the limits of the District of Columbia unless at the time of the delivery thereof to the person in charge of the wagon, cart, or other vehicle or conveyance used for and in the delivery thereof a written or printed certificate duly signed by or for the seller, showing separately the actual weight of said coal or coke and the name of the purchaser thereof, and the weight of the said wagon, cart, or other vehicle or conveyance, and showing the total weight of said coal, coke, wagon, cart, other vehicle, or conveyance. And any person who shall violate or neglect or refuse to comply with the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not more than $40: Provided, That all prosecutions under this act shall be brought in the police court of the District of Columbia on information filed by the corporation counsel or one of his assistants.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPENDENT MOTHERS OF DECEASED POLICEMEN AND FIREMEN.

The bill (H. R. 14813) to amend an act approved March 1, 1905, entitled "An act to amend section 4 of an act entitled 'An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia,' approved February 28, 1901," was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs that the provision of the act for the relief, during widowhood, of dependent mothers of unmarried deceased members of the Metropolitan police force and of unmarried deceased members of the fire department of the District of Columbia shall include such mothers of any such deceased members of the police force and of the fire department who have died from injury or disease prior to March 1, 1905.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FLATHEAD INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

The bill (H. R. 8461) to amend chapter 1495, Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands after allotment," as amended by section 9 of chapter 1179, Revised Statutes of the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. That is a long bill. Let it go over without prejudice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection made by the Senator from New Jersey, the bill will go over without prejudice.

Mr. CARTER subsequently said: I understand the Senator from New Jersey does not desire to pursue his objection to the consideration of House bill 8461.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to the bill whatever. I did not see the Senator present at the time.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the bill?

Mr. CARTER. The bill, briefly stated, is intended to cover an omission in the original act to open to settlement the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont., passed at the first session of the Fifty-eighth Congress.

It provides for the platting of certain town sites by the Secretary of the Interior at the places where settlements are already in existence on the reservation and the sale of the town lots, the money realized from such sales to go to the benefit of the Indians.

It also provides for the permanent reservation of the hot springs on the reservation, the same to be held permanently under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, and any revenue derived from the same to inure to the benefit of the Indians. The springs are reported to be of great medicinal value, and the purpose of the bill is to secure their free use to all the Indians and to prevent them falling into the hands of speculators.

The bill confirms to the appropriators of water the water heretofore appropriated by them for farming and domestic use. There is an amendment to the bill, reported by my colleague from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 3, after the word "act," insert:

There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF CHARLES F. WINTON, DECEASED.

The bill (S. 3994) to authorize the Court of Claims to consider the claims of Charles F. Winton, deceased, and others, against the Mississippi Choctaws, for services rendered and expenses incurred, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection made by the Senator from New Hampshire, the bill will go over without prejudice.

FORT CLINCH RESERVATION, FLA.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1697) confirming to certain claimants thereto portions of lands known as Fort Clinch Reservation, in the State of Florida.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all of the right, title, claim, and interest of the United States in and to the several lots of land in the old town of Fernandina, Nassau County, Fla., located on lot 2 of section 14, in township 3 north of range 28 east of Tallahassee principal meridian, which were granted by Spain to certain persons prior to the cession of Florida to the United States, and afterwards confirmed by the United States to such persons, their heirs, representatives, and assigns, prior to the issuance of the order creating the Fort Clinch Military Reservation, shall be, and the same are hereby, confirmed, granted, released, and relinquished to the said several persons to whom said lots were so granted by Spain and confirmed by the United States, respectively, and their respective heirs, representatives, and assigns; and that all the right, title, claim, and interest of the United States in and to lots 1 and 2 of section 14, in township 3 north of range 28 east of said meridian, except the said lots granted by Spain to certain persons and confirmed by the United States as above mentioned, and except the block of the old town of Fernandina known as the Plaza, and the military road from said town to Fort Clinch, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed, granted, released, and relinquished to the several persons and corporations, respectively, now claiming or holding the same under a patent issued by the United States to David L. Yulee, dated the 5th day of September, 1853, to said lot 2, and under an approval and certification by the Secretary of the Interior of the United States to the State of Florida of said lot 1, as swamp and overflowed lands, under an act of Congress dated the 28th day of September, 1850: Provided, however, That titles to that portion of said lands which are now held by said town of Fernandina for public purposes, whether claimed under the act of Congress of June 15, 1844 (5 Stat., p. 667), or otherwise, shall be, and hereby are, confirmed, granted, released, and relinquished to said town of Fernandina: And provided further, That the said military road shall be kept open and maintained by the county or municipal authorities or by the beneficiaries under this act without expense to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF WILLIAM A. HAMMOND.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Senate to take from the Calendar the bill (S. 290) to amend the act approved March 15, 1878, entitled "An act for the relief of William A. Hammond, late Surgeon-General of the Army."

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 10, after the word "from," to strike out the words "the date of his appointment and retirement under said act on August 27, A. D. 1879," and to insert "February 17, 1899;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 2 of the act entitled "An act for the relief of William A. Hammond, late Surgeon-General of the Army," approved March 15, 1878, as provides that said Hammond shall not be entitled to pay while on the retired list of the Army be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the said Hammond shall be entitled to the pay of a brigadier-general of the Army on the retired list from February 17, 1899, up to the date of his death, January 5, 1900, the same to be paid to Esther D. Hammond, his widow.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VESSELS IN ST. MARYS RIVER.

Mr. FRYE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4925) to amend the act approved March 6, 1896, relating to the anchorage and movements of vessels in St. Marys River.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 1 of the act so as to read:

That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to adopt and prescribe suitable rules and regulations governing the movements and anchorage of vessels and rafts in St. Marys River from Point Iriquois, on Lake Superior, to Point Detour, on Lake Huron, and for the purpose of enforcing the observance of such regulations the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to detail one or more revenue cutters for duty under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor on said river.

And to amend section 3 of the act, so as to read:

SEC. 3. That in the event of violation of any such regulations or rules of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, by the owners, masters, or person in charge of such vessel, such owner, master, or person in charge shall be liable to a penalty of $200: Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may remit said fine on such terms as he may prescribe: Provided also, That nothing in this act shall be construed to amend or repeal the act entitled "An act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters as far east as Montreal," approved February 8, 1895.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

H. R. 6067. An act to change the records of the War Department relative to Levi A. Meacham; and

H. R. 6182. An act for the relief of Henry C. Vincent.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this great question of rate making, perhaps one of the greatest which has ever come before the Congress to solve, is soon to be settled. So far as my vote is concerned it shall be settled in favor of all the people, and this will include the railroads, for they, as well as the people, in the end will be benefited. I shall give my hearty support to the pending bill, which is known as the "Hepburn-Dolliver bill," as it come from the House of Representatives, with some amendments which, in my judgment, are necessary and which will strengthen it and render it less open to constitutional objections. This question, I admit, Mr. President, is bristling with many serious, intricate, and important legal propositions; but, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to pass it up to the Supreme Court and let that high tribunal settle these questions, if it has not already done so. I am not one of those who believe or have even the remotest suspicion that any railroad lawyer had anything whatever to do with framing this bill, but I am convinced and have no doubt in my mind that it was framed by brave, high-minded men, with the purest and most patriotic motives, and who were moved only with an eye single to the happiness of the people and the welfare of the country. The principles of law arising out of the question have been most ably and exhaustively discussed by some of the ablest lawyers in this body, and it is a most remarkable fact and worthy of mention that no two lawyers seem to agree on all of the legal points involved. But this is not passing strange when we consider that the Supreme Court of the United States itself, in many of the cases cited as authority upon these questions, is divided upon some one or more of the great legal propositions. I believe in the Minnesota case (134 U. S., p. 418) Justices Bradley, Lamar, and Gray dissent from the opinion of the court, and Justice Miller in his concurring opinion does not hesitate to tell the profession that he does so with many misgivings.

We are gravely told that we have no power to establish a standard and delegate to a commission, or some other tribunal, as an administrative body, the authority, when complaint is made, to fix a just and reasonable rate in accordance with this standard, and thus carry out the will of Congress. Is it possible that this can be so, Mr. President? If so, there is coming soon, and is bound to come, an irrepressible conflict between the rights of the people and the railroads which will not down and will not likely be terminated until we shall have a constitutional amendment or, what is worse, the government ownership of all the railroads. Forbid that this day will ever come. Pass this bill and enforce the law as it is written, and I predict there will be no need of any drastic legislation, no demand for government ownership. With us the rights of the people are sacred, sacred as Holy Writ, and even so are sacred the just rights of the corporations. All must have the equal protection of the law. The people of this country believe in fair play. They do not desire, Mr. President, the services of the railroads without giving just compensation for the service performed. Neither do they desire that the courts be denied to any; but they will insist that the courts shall be opened at all times to pass upon the rights of everybody alike, to the humblest and the greatest, to the rich and the poor, to the shipper and the great corporations, without sale, denial, or delay.

> In a free government almost all other rights would become utterly worthless if the government possessed an uncontrolled power over the private fortunes of every citizen. One of the fundamental objects of liberty and government must be a due administration of justice, and how vain it would be to speak of such an administration when all property was subject to the will or caprice of the legislature and the ruling. (Story on the Constitution.)

The people do not desire in any respect to cripple the railroads, but they do demand that the rates be just and reasonable. They do demand that the small shipper shall not be discriminated against in favor of the large shipper. They demand that one community shall not be pulled down and destroyed for the upbuilding of another. They do demand that no special privileges in the way of rebates or preferentials shall be granted to the favored few to the detriment and injury of the many, to the destruction and wiping out of all competition.

We are told there is no demand for this law. The President in two annual messages has recommended and urged it in the strongest terms. In his last annual message he says:

> The immediate and most pressing need, so far as legislation is concerned, is the enactment into law of some scheme to secure to the agents of the Government such supervision and regulation of the rates charged by the railroads of the country engaged in interstate traffic as shall summarily and effectively prevent the imposition of unjust or unreasonable rates. It must include putting a complete stop to rebates in every shape and form. * * *
> The first consideration to be kept in mind is that the power should be affirmative, and should be given to some administrative body created by Congress. * * *
> In my judgment the most important provision which such law should contain is that conferring upon some competent administrative body the power to decide, upon the case being brought before it, whether a given rate prescribed by a railroad is reasonable and just, and if it be found to be unreasonable and unjust, then, after full investigation of the complaint, to prescribe the limit of rate beyond which it shall not be lawful to go—the maximum reasonable rate, as it is commonly called—this decision to go into effect within a reasonable time and to remain from thence onward, subject to review by the courts. * * *

Three times the great Democratic party in convention assembled has in its platform declared for it. The House of Representatives, fresh from the people, has passed the bill by an almost unanimous vote. State legislatures, chambers of commerce, business organizations, and the press have urged its passage. Nay, the demand is universal. The whole country is aroused upon this subject, and aroused as it has seldom been before. The time has come, Mr. President, when there must be wise legislation along this line, legislation which shall accomplish the result sought for, legislation which is conservative, yet such legislation as will speak out in the most positive, the strongest, and most unequivocal terms.

Mr. President, during the eighties, and perhaps as far back as 1878 to 1889, from one end of the country to the other, there was great agitation upon the subject of rate regulation. It was then said and believed that the railroads were charging excessive and exorbitant rates, that they were discriminating against localities and giving rebates. A commission of Congress found this as a fact, and in response to this demand many of the States established railroad commissions, and in 1887 Congress enacted what is known as the "interstate-commerce law," which this bill proposes to amend. In 1883, being a member of the State legislature, I introduced a bill for the creation of a railroad commission for North Carolina. It failed to pass, but in 1889 a law was enacted in that State creating a commission which has administered the law in a satisfactory manner both to the railroads and to the people. It was then claimed, as it is claimed to-day, that such legislation would bring disaster, would cause the shrinkage of securities; that it would stop the wheels of progress, retard the building of railroads, and that dire calamity would follow. Then, too, it was denied that the legislature could delegate its power to an administrative body or to any other tribunal to fix rates.

Mr. President, none of these predictions came true. Other States have had the same experience. In many of them the commissions were enjoined by the courts and much litigation was had growing out of this legislation. And it was then finally held by the highest courts in the States, without, perhaps, a single exception, that in the absence of special constitutional restraint it was competent for the legislature of the State, in the exercise of its police power, to regulate the tolls and charges of the railroad companies, all quasi public corporations, and could even regulate the business of individuals who were carrying on any enterprise affecting the public interest. Many of these decisions, upon a writ of error, were carried to the Supreme Court of the United States and affirmed. In the Granger cases (116 U. S.) and in a long line of cases since that time it has been so held, until it can no longer be a question of any doubt that the States have this power. In one of these cases, Munn v. Illinois (94 U. S., 113), Mr. Chief Justice Waite, delivering the opinion of the Court, says:

> Under these powers (the police power) the Government regulates the conduct of its citizens one toward another and the manner in which each shall use his own property, when such regulations become necessary for the public good. In their exercise it has been customary in England from time immemorial, and in this country from its colonization, to regulate ferries, common carriers, inns, hackmen, bakers, etc., and in so doing to fix a maximum of charge to be made for services rendered, accommodations furnished, and articles sold.

In 1887 Congress, in response to this great demand, established the Interstate Commerce Commission, investing it with certain powers, and among these powers so granted it was construed by this Commission, presided over by Judge Cooley, one of the greatest lawyers in this land, that there was in the act the implied power to fix rates, and they proceeded to exercise it. For ten years they acted upon this construction, until it was held in the Cincinnati case, Commerce Commission v. R. R. Co., U. S., 479), that they had no such power. During these ten years, notwithstanding the many predictions that dire calamity would follow such legislation, this country prospered as it never had before. Thousands of miles of railroads have been built, until now several great trunk lines cross and recross the continent, binding ocean to ocean with bars of steel, and bringing the people of the different sections of the country and communities widely separated into the closest business relations.

But, Mr. President, while it is conceded that the States undoubtedly have this power, it is seriously doubted and most strenuously contended upon this floor, and it has been most ably argued, that Congress can not delegate to any other body than itself the power to fix rates. When I was a young lawyer, twenty years ago, I brought suit for a client to recover a penalty denounced by the statute of my State against a railroad for charging more for a shorter distance over the same line to a point in another State. I lost the suit, it being held by the court of last resort that the statute was void as to shipments made outside of the State, and that this was a matter wholly within the power of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution. And ever since that time I have bowed to the decisions of the court and had no doubt that Congress had the right to regulate interstate commerce, to control it fully, even to the extent of appointing a commission to fix rates.

The very purpose for which railroads are incorporated and operated is to carry on commerce, both domestic and interstate, to serve the public by the transportation of freight and passengers in and through the States; and while, as I have said, under the police power of the States, there is an inherent power to regulate commerce, there is no police power in the Federal Government to regulate commerce between the States. This is one thing which caused trouble among the colonies, the most serious trouble, and was one of the first reasons and the moving cause for the adoption of the Constitution. The States surrendered to the General Government, as it is written in the Constitution itself, and specifically granted in so many words, the power to regulate interstate commerce between the States and foreign nations. In the case of The Wabash Railroad v. Illinois (118 U. S., p. 557) Justice Miller uses this language:

> It can not be too strongly insisted upon that the right of continuous transportation from one end of the country to the other is essential in modern times to that freedom of commerce from the restraints which the States might choose to impose upon it—that the clause was intended to secure. This clause, giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, as this court said before, was among the most important of the subjects which prompted the formation of the Constitution.

In this case the facts were these: The railroad charged for transporting a carload of goods from Peoria, Ill., to New York $39, when, on the same day, it charged for shipping a carload of the same class of freight from Gilman, Ill., to New York the sum of $65—the carload from Peoria being carried 86 miles farther in the State of Illinois than the other carload. It was a suit for a penalty for unjust discrimination, and the court says, in reversing the judgment of the State court for the penalty:

> Of the justice and propriety of the principle which lies at the foundation of the Illinois statute it is not the province of this court to speak. * * * As restricted to a transportation which begins and ends within the limits of the State, it may be very just and equitable, and it is certainly the province of the State legislature to determine that question. * * * That this species of regulation is one which must be, if established at all, of a general and national character and can not be safely and wisely remitted to local rules and local regulations we think is clear. * * * And if it be a regulation of commerce, as we have demonstrated it is, and as the Illinois case concedes it to be, it must be of that national character, and the regulation can only appropriately exist by general rules and principles which demand that it should be done by the Congress of the United States under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

This general doctrine is established by a long line of cases, and nothing is more clearly established than that the transportation by common carriers of freight and passengers between the States is interstate commerce, which the Congress undoubtedly has the right to regulate without any limitation, except that no man's property can be taken without due process of law and without just compensation.

It has never been seriously contended that Congress itself could from a practicable standpoint actually fix rates. It is not only impracticable but impossible. It can fix the standard that the rates shall be just and reasonable, and then remit to an administrative body authority to fix a rate upon that basis. While we have no direct decision of any court upon this subject predicated upon the same state of facts, this is the common sense of it; and, reasoning by analogy, it is just what the court has intimated, if it has not definitely decided. No court, in my opinion, will decide otherwise. In Field v. Clark (143 U. S., p. 649), while not directly in point as to the facts, the following language used by the court is in point and there can be nothing plainer. The language is taken from Lock's appeal (72 Pa. State, 491), and is quoted by the Supreme Court, by Justice Harlan, with approval:

> The legislature can not delegate its power to make a law, but it can make a law and delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes or intends to make its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation must depend which can not be known to the lawmaking power, and must therefore be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation.

Also, in Butterfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S., 496), wherein was involved the construction of the law of Congress appointing a board of seven members, who were to prepare and submit to the Secretary of the Treasury samples of tea, and upon their recommendation the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to fix and establish a uniform standard of purity, quality, and fitness for consumption of all kinds of tea, the court says:

> This case is within the principles of Field against Clark, where it was decided that the third section of the tariff act of October 1, 1890, was not repugnant to the Constitution as conferring legislative and treaty-making power on the President, because it authorizes him to suspend the provisions of the act relating to the free introduction of sugar, etc. We may say of the legislation in this case that it does not in any real sense invest the administrative officials with the power of legislation. Congress legislated on the subject as far as was reasonably practicable, and from the necessities of the case was compelled to leave to executive officials the duty of bringing about the results pointed out by the statute. To deny the power of Congress to delegate such a duty would in effect amount but to declaring that the plenary power vested in Congress to regulate foreign commerce could not be efficaciously exerted.

Messrs. Prentice and Eagan, in their valuable work on the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, on page 31, also say, in summing up the whole matter:

> The test determining the validity of a delegation of discretionary power therefore appears to be that, if a controlling rule is fixed by the legislature and the power delegated is to apply this general rule to specific facts, or to determine some fact upon which the legislature makes its action depend, then the law is valid.

Fixing the standard, and then upon that basis fixing the rate, is purely a legislative function. It only becomes a judicial question when the rate is fixed which enables the court then to enjoin the enforcement of these rates so fixed, which may be confiscatory, and hence repugnant to the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution. I think this is what really is decided in the Reagan case, supra.

A commission invested by Congress with this authority is just as competent—vastly more competent—to make a rate than a rate-making board employed by the railroads. Both are to adjust rates. One is a partisan board acting for the railroads. The other is nonpartisan, free from bias, with a great public duty to perform, sworn to do their duty, acting for the people as well as for the railroads, sworn to do what is right and just between man and man, unmoved by any desire for pecuniary gain. One acting from a selfish motive, will, as a matter of course, make the rates which will be most advantageous to the railroads, with a view to making large dividends for their employers. The other will act only when a complaint is made that the rates are excessive and unreasonable; and not till then will make such a rate, after a full hearing is had upon the whole matter, as is just and reasonable, moved only by a sense of high public duty. The partisan board makes all the rates. The nonpartisan or Congressional board adjusts the rate already in execution which, in their judgment, is inflicting a wrong upon the people. The one is paid by the railroads. The other is paid by the Government. The railroads employ only such experts for this purpose as can make the best rates in the interest and for the benefit of the railroads. It is not probable that the President would appoint or that the Senate would confirm any person on this board who is not a man not only of experience and ability, but who is conservative, patriotic, broad minded, liberal, and just.

Under present conditions, if the rates are excessive and exorbitant, where can the shipper go for the redress of his wrongs? I have a letter from a citizen in my State, in which he says that he paid $40.34 on a carload of corn from Cincinnati, Ohio, to Kelley, Va., about 1,500 miles, and from Kelley to Rich Square, N. C., a distance of 47 miles, he had to pay $52.44. Think of it, $40 for 1,500 miles and $50 for 47 miles. This is only one of a thousand such instances. Is it right that this man, or these men, shall have no relief? Wherever there is a wrong the remedy should be provided. But in such a case there is no practical and effective redress provided. Shall they be required to bring suit in the Federal court? This is preposterous. To do so would mean bankruptcy and ruin to them. They simply have to grin and bear it. Why, Mr. President, I ask, if the rates are reasonable and not excessive, should the railroads complain? Why all this clamor and these predictions of ruin? If they are carrying on their business in such a way as not to injure the public the Commission can not affect them, but if they are not the people have a right to complain, and it is the duty of Congress to redress their wrongs, to appoint a tribunal to whom they can make their complaints and be heard. The railroads come in touch with more people and more people have business with the railroads than any other person or corporation in the world. They are a great convenience to our people. I would neither deprive them of their rights in the courts nor anywhere else. But the truth is, Mr. President, and we might as well speak it out, the railroads, acting under their chartered rights, are levying a tariff upon the people in the way of tolls and charges that we are told are not just; that do not bear fairly and equally on all alike. It is charged that they, by way of rebates and otherwise, make the rates easy for the rich and at the same time make them high for the poor and small shipper, the small manufacturer, and the great mass of producers and consumers in our country, driving many of them out of business.

Mr. President, I have introduced a proposed amendment to the bill, after the word "jurisdiction," in line 9, page 10 of the bill, which provides that no writ of injunction or interlocutory order shall be granted by any district or circuit court without first giving five days' notice to the adverse party or his attorney of the time and place of moving for the same, and not until petition and answer are filed and hearing thereon is had. To adopt an amendment something like this, I think, Mr. President, will not only aid in removing the constitutional objection, which has been raised to this section of the bill, but it is intended to prevent much of the trouble which it is predicted will come, and which will undoubtedly come if the railroads, simply upon an ex parte petition, could go into the courts and obtain an interlocutory decree or injunction against the rate going into effect upon constitutional grounds. This would mean practically to nullify the order of the Commission and practically to nullify the very will of Congress, thereby bringing the whole thing into ridicule and contempt. "Justice delayed is justice denied."

It seems from the decisions of the Supreme Court that Congress can absolutely take away from the courts, except the Supreme Court, their equity jurisdiction. The Supreme Court derives its equity jurisdiction from the Constitution itself, but the subordinate courts are purely creations of statute and derive their power and jurisdiction from Congress. The third article of the Constitution declares that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as the Congress shall from time to time ordain and establish." Inferior courts have been established from time to time, and some by the statute have been given equity jurisdiction, as the circuit courts; and also some have not, but have been denied this jurisdiction, as, for example, the Court of Claims.

No one will contend that Congress can not, if it so desired, abolish every inferior court of the United States, and I want to say here that I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], that if we did abolish them, it would be our sworn duty to reestablish them. If Congress can create these courts and abolish them at will, it would seem that they could limit their jurisdiction and take from them some of the jurisdictional powers they now have. In Sheldon v. Sill (8 Howard, p. 449) Justice Grier, in delivering the opinion of the court, says:

> Congress may withhold from any court of its creation jurisdiction of any of the enumerated controversies. Courts created by statutes can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers. No one of them can assert a just claim to jurisdiction exclusively conferred on another or withheld from all.

Again, in Turner v. The Bank (4 Dall., p. 1):

> The notion has frequently been entertained that the Federal courts derive their judicial power immediately from the Constitution, but the political truth is that the disposal of the judicial power (except in a few specified instances) belongs to Congress. If Congress has given the power to the court, we possess it; not otherwise; and if Congress has not given the power, * * * it still remains at the legislative disposal.

There is much force in the suggestion, I admit, Mr. President, that the court, being created and given jurisdiction of the subject matter, it might be held, in order to administer justice or to decide upon any constitutional rights that the suitor would have, and in order to administer his right and preserve his property from irreparable damage, and to hold it in statu quo during the determination of these rights, that the court could by the natural right of equity assume this equity jurisdiction. But, after investigation, I am of the opinion that we could limit the equity jurisdiction of the court in this case. I am certain that we could limit its practices and procedures. Congress has done so by statute twice in the past, and can do so again. Section 720 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is as follows:

> The writ of injunction shall not be granted by any court of the United States to stay proceedings in any court of a State, except in cases where such injunction may be authorized by any law relating to proceedings in bankruptcy.

Will anyone contend that this is not a limitation upon the equity courts by Congress? My friend the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, in his great speech—and I measure my words when I say "a great speech and a great argument"—cited as an authority the case in 193 United States, The Central Trust Company v. Julian, with which I was acquainted, having been an attorney in the case. I mention this case to show what a partisan judge can do, unless he is restrained by Congress, and while that case is an authority for the Senator from Wisconsin, it is also authority for me.

This is a remarkable case, Mr. President. There was a suit brought against a railroad in North Carolina and a judgment was rendered for $26,000 against a railroad company that had been sold out under a second mortgage to the Southern Railway Company. We contended that that railroad was still a domestic corporation, inasmuch as it had only been sold under a second mortgage; that the first mortgage being still outstanding, the State had never lost its visitorial power over that corporation, and inasmuch as the State when it grants a charter parts with a portion of its sovereignty, a foreign corporation could not come into a State and take away the visitorial power of the State over that domestic corporation. It was fought out in the State courts, and finally went to the court of last resort, which said that this road was liable for this money under execution. Then the parties went into court and asked for a receiver in order to collect their money. Then comes the iron hand of the Federal court, without giving any notice whatever to the parties, and enjoins not only the plaintiff, but enjoins every lawyer in the case, and not only every lawyer in the case, but enjoins the court itself. Then, Mr. President, we fought it out in the Federal court; and the circuit court of appeals dissolved the injunction as to these parties and said they could proceed as they were advised. They then caused execution to issue in the State court and put it into the hands of the sheriff. The property was advertised for sale in thirty days, and the matter waited until the night before the sale, when here comes another injunction enjoining the sheriff, enjoining the lawyers, and enjoining everybody from selling that property. The costs in this case were over $900, and I mention this to show that in many cases, if not all, the poor man can not afford to litigate in the Federal courts.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator state what judge that was?

Mr. OVERMAN. It was a South Carolina and a North Carolina judge—one a circuit and one a district judge. I do not care to mention the names.

Mr. TILLMAN. They were Federal judges, of course?

Mr. OVERMAN. They were Federal judges, of course.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not see why the Senator should object to giving the names. I am responsible for asking for it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I say one was a North Carolina judge.

Mr. TILLMAN. District or circuit?

Mr. OVERMAN. The circuit judge was a South Carolina judge. He is dead, and I do not desire to mention his name. The Senator knows to whom I refer.

Mr. TILLMAN. I had the misfortune, I suppose it was, to criticise the judiciary here the other day, and to make—I will not say a charge, but an assertion of my belief—that the reason why this particular point is being fought out so bitterly on the part of some of us is because the people have lost faith in the honesty and integrity of some of the Federal judges, and two Senators took issue with me in regard to the high character, ability, and honesty of purpose of the judges with whom they had had to deal, and another jumped in with the proposition that I must allude to some particular judge. I want to get a catalogue of the fellows who have been doing that kind of work.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator will see that it is a delicate matter. The Senator knows to whom I refer, and I do not care to mention names and have them put into the public records of the Senate.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] argued the question of the power that is vested in the court by the Constitution. Well, what is the judicial power? All legislative power is vested in Congress, all executive power is vested in the Executive, and all judicial power is vested in the judiciary.

Right here in passing I want to say for the benefit of the Senator from South Carolina that the reporter mentions a very interesting fact in this case from which I am about to quote—Osborn v. Bank of the United States (9 Wheaton, 738). It seems that Webster and Clay both appeared in that case and that Andrew Jackson was then President. President Jackson contended that in legislating Congress was not bound to obey the will of the Supreme Court even when an act had been declared unconstitutional, because Congress and the judiciary act independently of each other; that each member of the Senate or the House of Representatives is bound by his own construction of the Constitution; and because the Supreme Court is a coordinate branch of the Government that Congress is no more bound by the opinion of the judges of the Supreme Court than Congress and the Supreme Court would be bound by his actions or the opinion of a Senator.

Now, Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the question of judicial power. What does it mean? The Senator, as I understand, contends that whenever a court is established under this judicial power the court so established has the right, when the subject-matter is given to the court, to invoke all the ancient remedies—not the common-law remedies, but the ancient remedies in equity—in order to save the property of the litigant from irreparable damage and keep it in statu quo until his rights can be finally determined.

What is judicial power? I have looked through the dictionaries, but I find that Justice Marshall, in this very case, has given the very best definition of it. If his definition is correct and also his reasoning, it seems to me that Congress has the right to limit the jurisdiction of any court that it establishes. In this case the great Chief Justice said as follows:

> Judicial power, as contradistinguished from the power of the laws, has no existence. Courts are the mere instruments of the law and can will nothing. When they are said to exercise a discretion it is a mere legal discretion, a discretion to be exercised in discerning the course prescribed by law; and when that is discerned it is the duty of the court to follow it. Judicial power is never exercised for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the judge; always for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the legislature, or, in other words, to the will of the law.

Along this line I will read the great case of Chisholm v. Georgia—the case that produced almost a revolution in this country, and caused the adoption of the eleventh amendment to the Constitution. The opinion in that case was delivered by Judge Iredell of my State, one of the greatest judges that ever sat upon the Supreme Court of the United States.

In that case, Mr. Randolph, the attorney-general, was arguing along the line of the Senator from Wisconsin's idea of the judicial power, that when the court was created, that minute it had in it power to invoke all these remedies of which we have been talking. Let us see what he says:

> The attorney-general has indeed suggested another construction, a construction, I confess, that I never heard of before, nor can I now consider it grounded on any solid foundation, though it appeared to me to be the basis of the attorney-general's argument. His construction I take to be this: "That the moment a supreme court is formed it is to exercise all the judicial power vested in it by the Constitution, by its own authority, whether the legislature has prescribed methods of doing so or not." My conception of the Constitution is entirely different. I conceive that all the courts of the United States must receive not merely their organization as to the number of judges of which they are to consist, but all their authority as to the manner of their proceeding from the legislature only. This appears to me to be one of those cases, with many others, in which an article of the Constitution can not be effectuated without the intervention of the legislative authority. There being many such, at the end of the special enumeration of the powers of Congress in the Constitution is this general one:
> "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." None will deny that an act of legislation is necessary to say at least of what number the judges are to consist. The President, with the consent of the Senate, could not nominate a number at his discretion. The Constitution intended this article so far, at least, to be the subject of a legislative act. Having a right thus to establish the court, and it being capable of being established in no other manner, I conceive it necessarily follows that they are also to direct the manner of its proceedings.
> Upon this authority there is, that I know, but one limit—that is, "that they shall not exceed their authority." If they do, I have no hesitation to say that any act to that effect would be utterly void, because it would be inconsistent with the Constitution, which is a fundamental law, paramount to all others, which we are not only bound to consult, but sworn to observe; and therefore where there is an interference, being superior in obligation to the other, we must unquestionably obey that in preference. Subject to this restriction, the whole business of organizing the courts and directing the methods of their proceeding, where necessary, I conceive to be in the discretion of Congress. If it shall be found, on this occasion or on any other, that the remedies now in being are defective for any purpose it is their duty to provide for, they no doubt will provide others. It is their duty to legislate so far as is necessary to carry the Constitution into effect. It is ours only to judge. We have no reason nor any more right to distrust their doing their duty than they have to distrust that we all do ours. There is no part of the Constitution that I know of that authorizes this court to take up any business where they left it, and in order that the powers given in the Constitution may be in full activity supply their omission by making new laws for new cases, or, which I take to be the same thing, applying old principles to new cases materially different from those to which they were applied before.
> With regard to the Attorney-General's doctrine of incidents, that was founded entirely on the supposition of the other I have been considering. The authority contended for is certainly not one of those necessarily incident to all courts merely as such.
> If, therefore, this court is to be, as I consider it, the organ of the Constitution and the law, not of the Constitution only, in respect to the manner of its proceeding, we must receive our directions from the legislature in this particular, and have no right to constitute ourselves an officina brevium, or take any other short method of doing what the Constitution has chosen, and, in my opinion, with the most perfect propriety, should be done in another manner.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator please state what was the direct point at issue upon which that ruling was made?

Mr. OVERMAN. One State suing another.

Mr. BACON. Of course that is the foundation of the suit; but what was the particular question to which that language was applied?

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. My recollection, if the Senator will permit me, is that it was not a question of one State suing another, but of an individual suing a State.

Mr. BACON. It was the case of an individual suing a State.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of an individual suing a State; that is right.

Mr. FULTON. I will say, while I am on my feet, that it is my recollection that the majority of the court was against the doctrine announced by the justice from whose opinion the Senator has read.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not so read it. Justice Jay, I believe, and all the judges wrote opinions in the case on account of its great importance.

Mr. FULTON. Each of the judges in that case, as I recall, delivered an opinion, and the majority were against the conclusion reached by the justice from whose opinion the Senator has read.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not so construe it; and I think the judge is right. All the other decisions I have cited and from which I have quoted clearly sustain him in this conclusion.

Mr. FULTON. I would not say that the other opinions are based on doctrines differing necessarily from the particular portion quoted by the Senator; but now I would ask the Senator if he does not make a distinction between the power of Congress to vest jurisdiction in a court in a particular case, and, on the other hand, the power of Congress to state how that case shall be decided?

Mr. OVERMAN. What is judicial power? I have shown what Judge Marshall says it is. It really means, as against legislative power, nothing. But, another thing: What is this power when the court is established? It is such a power as is given to it by the Constitution and the law.

Mr. FULTON. Let me ask the Senator, then, if judicial power that is spoken of in the Constitution, where the Constitution says that the judicial power is vested in a Supreme Court, does not include jurisdiction? Jurisdiction is only one element of that judicial power. Judicial power is more than jurisdiction in a cause.

Mr. OVERMAN. Power to enforce its orders.

Mr. FULTON. When the legislature gives a court jurisdiction of a certain cause——

Mr. OVERMAN. In answer to the Senator I want to read——

Mr. FULTON. Judicial power vests in the court to determine that cause, and becomes constitutional.

Mr. OVERMAN. In answer to the Senator from Oregon, I read again from Marshall's Complete Constitutional Decisions in the case of Ex parte Swartout, who, as a basis for his decision, lays down this proposition in the very beginning of his opinion:

> As preliminary to any investigation of the merits of this motion, this court deems it proper to declare that it disclaims all jurisdiction not given by the Constitution or by the laws of the United States.
> Courts which originate in the common law possess a jurisdiction which must be regulated by their common law until some statute shall change their established principles——

Then, if we limit it, there is a statute limiting the old common-law remedy, or the remedy in equity—— > but courts which are created by written law, and whose jurisdiction is defined by written law, can not transcend that jurisdiction.

That is what the great Marshall says. Can anything be plainer than that?

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator, then, tell us what is jurisdiction?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no legal definition. I wish I did know. I should like the Senator to give me the legal definition.

Mr. FULTON. I was asking a question; I was not proposing to answer it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Jurisdiction is the right of a court, legal authority, either conferred by the Constitution or by the laws to do some particular thing, or to invoke to its aid some ancient remedy, in passing upon the rights or wrongs of the people. I should say that is a horseback definition. That is about what I think it is. I doubt whether anybody could define it properly; but I know the court says you can limit the jurisdiction.

In chapter 22, section 5, United States Statutes at Large, there is a special prohibition that writs of injunction shall not be granted without reasonable notice to the adverse party or his attorney. And in the case of New York v. Connecticut (4 Dall., p. 1) the Supreme Court held that this prohibition extends not only to the circuit court, but to the Supreme Court itself, whose equity jurisdiction is given by the Constitution.

Then if we can impair it for one day or two days or three days, we can impair it forever. It is certainly decided in this case that you can impair it. Jurisdiction does not attach—the court is deprived of it unless notice is given. Then if we can prohibit it for a day by the required notice to be given, why not prohibit it forever? Has time anything to do with it?

That is the point I make. I am in favor of allowing these corporations to have their day in court just the same as an individual. I am in favor of giving them the same rights that the individual has. This amendment which I have proposed is constitutional. The court has so decided it, and from all the cases I have cited here, after we decide what "judicial power" means, in the language of Judge Marshall, if we are satisfied on that point there is nothing clearer to my mind than that we can limit the entire jurisdiction of the court as to the equity practice, and we certainly can limit it as to the time when the notice shall be given and the complaint filed.

To repeat, in chapter 22, section 5, United States Statutes at Large, there is a special prohibition that writs of injunction shall not be granted without reasonable notice to the adverse party or his attorney. And in the case of New York v. Connecticut (4 Dall., p. 1) the Supreme Court held that this prohibition extends not only to the circuit court, but to the Supreme Court itself, whose equity jurisdiction is given by the Constitution.

Here are two precedents of Congress, one where there is a limitation upon the equity jurisdiction of the courts, and the other a limitation upon the practice and procedure of issuing interlocutory decrees. But I want to say right here, let the courts of the land be open at all times to the rich and poor alike, to the individual and corporation, and let justice be administered freely, completely, and without delay; but the point I make is this, that the amendment suggested will in no wise abridge or limit the right of the railroad, the shipper, or anyone else. It is only a limitation upon the procedure and practice of the courts when injunctive relief is sought in this particular case. Limit as to the time when, the place where, and the notice to be given is no limitation upon the constitutional or any other right the petitioner or complainant might have.

Mr. President, I have heard it said during this debate that the law must bear equally upon all alike, and not to make this limitation apply in all cases would be class legislation, and therefore unconstitutional. I contend that it is not special legislation as to a particular class. It does not apply to one railroad, but to all railroads. Taxation by the State upon the gross incomes of the railroads, the fellow-servant act, the mechanics' lien law, and many laws of this special character have been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. This court says in Missouri Railroad Company v. Mackay (127 U. S., p. 209):

> The objection that the law of 1874 deprives the railroad companies of equal protection of the laws is even less tenable than the one considered. It seems to rest upon the theory that legislation which is special in its character is necessarily within the constitutional inhibition; but nothing can be further from the fact. The greater part of all legislation is special, either in the objects sought to be attained by it or in regard to its application. * * * And when legislation applies to particular bodies or associations, imposing upon them additional liabilities, it is not open to the objection that it denies to them the equal protection of the laws, if all persons brought under its influence are treated alike under the same conditions. A law giving to mechanics a lien on buildings constructed or repaired by them for the amount of their work, and a law requiring railroad corporations to erect and maintain fences along their roads, separating them from lands of adjoining proprietors, so as to keep cattle off their track, are instances of this kind. Such legislation is not obnoxious to the last clause of the fourteenth amendment, if all persons subject to it are treated alike under similar circumstances and conditions in respect both of the privileges conferred and the liabilities imposed. It is conceded that corporations are persons within the meaning of the amendment.

This, of course, refers to legislation in the States as applied to the fourteenth amendment. I only cite this by way of illustration.

But Mr. President, it is clear to my mind that this amendment is constitutional upon the common-sense view of it and the sound reasoning of this opinion. This amendment, taken in connection with the other provisions of the bill, if not in express words, certainly by implication will give the court of review, which has been so earnestly contended for. The rate is fixed by one administrative body carrying out the will of Congress. If it is confiscatory and if this rate will take away the property of the railroads without just compensation, or if it is claimed their property is taken without due process of law, the way to the courts for injunctive relief is open. Notice is given to the adverse party, the petition is filed, the answer is filed, full hearing by both sides is had, and decree is made suspending the rate or the petition is dismissed and an appeal is allowed.

Furthermore, Mr. President, is it fair to the people or the Commission, which is to be composed of seven men—some learned in the law, and men of unusual ability and business experience, who have heard the case and given a patient and careful hearing before fixing the rate, have heard all the testimony, have heard the attorneys on both sides, and made their order after deliberation and consideration—I repeat, is it fair to them to have their action arbitrarily set aside by a partisan judge by injunction, when the adverse party had no opportunity to be heard? Why should a judge who is unfamiliar with these intricate problems, who may know the law, but who is not expected to be acquainted with the business of fixing rates, and without hearing the testimony for the complainant, why should he be permitted simply upon an ex parte affidavit of the petitioner to order the injunction to issue? The Commission in a judicial sense is not a court, but it has all the procedure given it that a court exercises. There is the notice served, the complaint made, the answer filed, the testimony taken on both sides, and the order, which is the same thing as the judgment, is made. This looks very much like due process of law. The only thing absent is the judge holding his office for life created by Congress. That is the only difference. I know in the Reagan case they held it was not a court and that it was not due process of law.

I confess, Mr. President, I do not like some of the verbiage of the bill. I do not like the words "fairly remunerative," and these words added to the words "just and reasonable." The language of the bill is, "shall prescribe what will be a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate or rates." Why use so many adjectives to describe the rates to be fixed? Why not use the plain words of the Constitution, "just compensation?" To say that it would be fairly remunerative would, in my judgment, involve the question unnecessarily. What would be a fairly remunerative rate for the amount invested coupled with the direction to fix a just and reasonable rate, according to the rule laid down in the Nebraska case, would present a very troublesome question to the Commission. The man from Texas, where the legal rate of interest is 10 per cent; from South Carolina, where it is 8 per cent; from North Carolina, where it is 6 per cent, and in some other States, where it is 4 per cent, all would have a very different idea as to what constitutes a fair and remunerative rate. What is just compensation for services performed is easily understood and easily arrived at, or to use the words "just and reasonable" would be equally satisfactory.

Mr. President, when, in 1887, there was a demand for this kind of legislation there were hundreds of competing lines of railroads in this land. Since that time there has been a most wonderful evolution in the railroad world. Competition has, to a great extent, been eliminated and practically destroyed. Consolidation has gone on and on in the face of all opposition, even in the face of legislative and judicial opposition. It has gone so far that we will never see again the old discarded method of small competing lines. This consolidation has continued until we see 95 per cent—practically all the railroads of the entire country—organized and consolidated into six great groups: First, the Vanderbilt group, speaking in round numbers, with its 22,000 miles and with a capitalization of more than a billion dollars; second, the Pennsylvania group, with its 20,000 miles and its capitalization of $2,000,000,000; third, the Morgan-Hill group, with its 47,000 miles and its capitalization of $2,000,000,000; fourth, the Gould-Rockefeller group, with its 28,000 miles and its capitalization of $1,200,000,000; fifth, the Harriman group, with its 23,000 miles and its capitalization of $1,300,000,000; sixth, the Moore group, with its 25,000 miles and its capitalization of $1,000,000,000. I ask that I be permitted to add in the RECORD a statement showing the mileage and capitalization of these groups.

But, Mr. President, not only is this enormous percentage of railway property controlled by these six groups, but there exists a community of interests between them, and the groups themselves are linked together, and the interests which control one overlaps the other. They are banded and bound together by the closest commercial and industrial ties for the purpose of mutual advantage. It is in effect one gigantic entity, collecting more than $2,000,000,000 annually out of the people in tolls and charges. Some of them have gone out beyond their legitimate business, have violated their charters and the law of the land, have monopolized the coal mines, and have invested their money in other business outside of the legitimate business for which they were chartered, until the Supreme Court has lately denounced this unlawful departure and said they were acting beyond the scope of their charter rights. Legislation to prevent it is now pending in this body. If it was necessary for the welfare of the country to enact legislation for the regulation of rates in 1887, how much more important is it to do so now. It is not only imperative, but it is suicidal not to do so, and the party most to suffer will be the railroads themselves. You may amend this bill so as to destroy its efficiency, you may emasculate its provisions, it may be decided by the courts to be unconstitutional, but the demand for government regulation will not down; it will come again, and when it does come the demand will be louder, stronger than ever before, and, like a mountain torrent, it will come with such force that it can not be resisted; it will sweep away and engulf all opposition.

The cotton crop, Mr. President, last year was in the neighborhood of 11,000,000 bales. The high-salaried rate-making experts for these six groups of railroads, acting only for the master and with a selfish purpose, could have met in the early fall and, by putting on an additional 10 cents freight on each bale of cotton, have added to their annual receipts more than a million dollars, and at the same time have taken that much from the pockets of the people. And by the same process, by making an additional 10 cents per hundredweight freight over the old rate on the agricultural products of the entire country, their illegitimate gains would have mounted into the hundreds of millions. Shall this power remain in this gigantic, centralized, powerful, and uncontrolled organization? Who is it that would pay this enormous sum? It is not the shipper nor the middleman, but it is always paid by the producer and consumer. These are they who, after all, suffer from unreasonable and discriminating charges. They pay the freight, but they can not recover the unjust excess. They are helpless, and it is this great mass of our people which will be mostly benefited by this legislation. For fifty years the common carriers have been regulating the tolls and charges to suit themselves without let or hindrance. Now let the people have a place where they can go and be heard and be protected from unjust, discriminating, and unequal rates. These paid experts are human; they want all they can get; they are paid by the master. A little here and a little there added to the present rate, a classification here and a reclassification there, may make a difference of many hundred thousands of dollars. This difference is not likely to be made in favor of the shipper. The people have no unjust demand to make; they are always on the side of justice, equality, and truth. Pass this law, and if it shall stand the test of the courts, as I believe it will, all bitterness will pass away; prejudice will give place to confidence; the people will know that they have a forum where they can make their complaints and be heard. The railroads will also be heard; the courts will be opened to all. Railroad building will not cease, calamity will not come, the wages of the employees will not be lowered, progress will go on, even-handed justice will be meted out to all alike, and the cause of the people will be triumphant.

APPENDIX.

The important statistical facts regarding the six great groups of railroads are as follows:

1. THE VANDERBILT GROUP.

The detailed figures of the various lines embraced in the group are as follows:

	Capitalization.
New York Central system proper	$210,276,410
Leased lines	171,753,595
Lake Shore and Michigan Southern system	101,265,000
New York, Chicago and St. Louis Railroad	49,425,000
Michigan Central Railway system	40,013,000
Lake Erie and Western Railway	34,555,000
Indiana, Illinois and Iowa Railroad	9,850,000
Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis system	96,602,037
Cincinnati Northern Railway	4,000,000
Chicago and Northwestern Railway system	303,226,542
Chesapeake and Ohio Railway system	138,228,579
Smaller systems and branches (about)	10,000,000
Total capitalization afloat of all lines embraced in the Vanderbilt group	1,169,196,132
The total mileage of these same systems is ..... miles	21,888

2. THE PENNSYLVANIA GROUP.

Pennsylvania Railroad system proper, lines both east and west of Pittsburg and Erie	$873,398,368
Baltimore and Ohio Railroad system	392,846,225
Norfolk and Western Railway system	142,097,500
Reading system	394,060,142
Total capitalization	1,822,402,235
Total mileage ..... miles	10,709

3. THE MORGAN-HILL GROUP.

Northern Securities Company (stock)	$264,867,849
Chicago, Burlington and Quincy system (bonds)	152,972,400
Northern Pacific Railway system (bonds)	286,798,433
Great Northern Railway system (bonds)	205,679,148
Southern Railway system proper	365,755,265
Alabama Great Southern, affiliated and miscellaneous lines	18,800,000
Central of Georgia Railway system	54,146,000
Atlantic Coast Line system (including Louisville and Nashville, etc.)	297,097,650
Hocking Valley system	54,187,214
Erie Railroad system	$972,321,100
Lehigh Valley system	93,400,000
Total capitalization	2,265,116,559
Total mileage ..... miles	47,206

4. THE GOULD-ROCKEFELLER GROUP.

Missouri Pacific system	$233,606,875
Texas and Pacific system	85,900,125
Wabash Railroad system	102,000,000
St. Louis Southwestern system	36,187,250
Denver and Rio Grande system	127,500,100
Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway system	149,072,500
International Great Northern system	34,691,052
Wheeling and Lake Erie system	53,728,350
Western Maryland system	118,654,500
Colorado Southern system	77,197,378
Delaware, Lackawanna and Western system	119,124,310
Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul system	230,567,500
Total capitalization	1,368,877,540
Total mileage ..... miles	28,137

5. THE HARRIMAN GROUP.

Union Pacific system, proper	$451,762,955
Southern Pacific system	460,939,256
Illinois Central Railroad system	226,560,000
Chicago and Alton Railway system	100,980,800
Kansas City Southern Railway	81,000,000
Total capitalization	1,321,243,711
Total mileage ..... miles	22,343

6. THE MOORE GROUP.

Rock Island Company (embracing all controlled properties)	$490,771,800
Seaboard Air Line system	110,207,600
Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe system	458,271,530
Total capitalization	1,059,250,930
Total mileage ..... miles	25,092
Total capitalization of the six groups	9,017,016,907
Total mileage of the six groups ..... miles	164,586

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, it seems that Senators are rather indifferent about getting ready their speeches on this matter. I recognize its great importance, and that it takes time for anyone to prepare himself to discuss it with any profit to the Senate. But it seems to me there ought to be a little more industry on the part of those who want to participate in this debate, unless they are willing to agree upon some time when we may get a vote.

I am ready to make a suggestion along that line, if it is agreeable to those who are in charge of the opposition. I do not know exactly where the opposition is; this is a kind of nondescript arrangement anyhow, but there must be an opposition here, else Senators would be ready to talk or at least be in a humor to determine when they will be ready to vote on the bill. I have had notice that several Senators want to discuss the bill later on in the week, and I have heard that there are one or two who will not be ready until next week. I am in no great hurry to have a day fixed for a vote, provided I can get some information from the opposition or from those who want to change the bill as to when we shall have a vote. Can the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] inform me as to when we may arrive at a time for voting?

Mr. KEAN. I do not think there is any disposition on this side of the Chamber unnecessarily to delay a vote, but I do not think the Senator has got quite as far along with the bill as fixing a date for a vote. I will aid the Senator all I can in getting a vote at an early day.

Mr. TILLMAN. In what way will the Senator aid me?

Mr. KEAN. By trying to urge Senators to deliver their speeches.

Mr. TILLMAN. People who will not talk ought to be willing to vote.

Mr. KEAN. I am willing to vote, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. There are quite a number of amendments which have been introduced, printed, and are lying on the table. Some of them I introduced myself. I send to the desk and ask to have read an amendment, and I will ask the Senator from South Carolina whether he can not accept it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That no carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall, directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person a greater or less compensation for interstate transportation of passengers than it collects, demands, collects, or receives from any other person for a like and equally good service. And any carrier violating this provision shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination and shall for each offense pay to the United States a penalty of not less than one hundred nor more than two thousand dollars: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the free carriage of destitute or indigent persons, or the issuance of mileage or excursion passenger tickets, or prevent such carriers from giving free or reduced transportation to ministers of religion, or to the inmates of hospitals, eleemosynary and charitable institutions, or to prevent any such carrier from giving free transportation over its own lines to any of its officers, agents, employees, attorneys, stockholders, or directors, or to the families of its employees.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is a little hard to get the exact meaning, in a legal way, of an amendment like that from merely hearing it read, but, as I catch it, it is designed to stop the issuing of free passes, is it not?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; it is.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I were permitted, if I had a committee with which I could consult, I would be perfectly willing to accept the amendment, and I hope that I will get from those who are supposed to be the opponents of this bill some help in incorporating this provision in it, anyway.

Mr. FORAKER. This is the amendment I offered in the committee, and that is the reason why I asked the Senator if he would not be willing to accept it here on the floor of the Senate. It is a provision with which every member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce is entirely familiar. It is designed to break up the practice of giving free passes over common carriers, and it is designed also to break up the practice of common carriers giving passes to their officers and their employees, except only over their own lines. Hereafter, if this provision should be enacted, no common carrier can give a pass for a private car to officers of some other road to travel over its road and around all over the country wherever the occupants of the car may see fit to go.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I would be very glad if the Senator from Ohio would state to the Senate in what respect the provision he has offered enlarges the prohibitions of the existing law. I did not hear the word "pass" mentioned in the amendment. We have already in the law provisions against discriminations. We have exceptions in favor of the poor and the good and persons in distress in various forms; and if we are going to put in an amendment to prohibit the issuing of free transportation in the form of free tickets or passes it strikes me that in order to avoid an ambiguity which grew up in respect of the existing law it might be well to more perfectly define what we are driving at.

Mr. FORAKER. I have not any objection to its being made more specific than it is if the Senator thinks it is not specific enough.

But answering his question, I can tell him that the amendment contains penalties for the violation of its provisions. The existing law does not. This also provides, as I have already indicated, that passes can not be given by officials of common-carrier companies to railroad officers and employees or their families except over their own lines. I think one of the greatest nuisances in the country is the practice of officers of railroads having their private cars and traveling all over the country, to the detriment of the transportation of other passengers in trains to which the private cars may be attached. If they want to do that, let them travel as other people do. When they get off their own line, let them get accommodations for compensation just as other people do.

In these particulars the amendment differs from the existing law. I do not care how much more specific the Senator makes it, but I do want certain things in it. I want the provisions that I have referred to, and I want also another provision which is not in the existing law, and that is that for the same compensation there shall be equal service to all who pay the same compensation.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I am in perfect sympathy with the object he has in view, but knowing the intention of Congress in 1887 to prohibit free transportation and knowing how completely the law has failed in practical operation to accomplish that result, I would deem it wise, if the Senator desires to enlarge the provisions of the existing law, to do it in a way so distinct that hereafter there will be neither ambiguity nor doubt about the application of the provisions.

Mr. FORAKER. I am sure the Senator can not find in this provision any ambiguity or any room for doubt. Certainly we will have the benefit, with reference to the enforcement of this provision, of the penalties which the amendment enumerates.

Mr. DOLLIVER. There are amendments or bills pending here which use the word "pass," and they have a tendency to identify the transaction with a great deal more distinctness than any language I find in the honorable Senator's amendment.

Mr. FORAKER. In the committee there was no objection made to this amendment on the ground that it was not sufficiently specific. But in the committee I could not get this provision or any other kind of a provision prohibiting the granting of passes incorporated in the bill, and I propose to find out whether or not we can put such a provision in the bill on the floor of the Senate, I do not care whether it is this provision or not.

I offered the amendment because it is a provision which was embodied in the bill I introduced in the Senate. It is the same provision that I offered in the committee, and I offer it now simply to bring the question before the Senate. I do not care whether it is voted on now or not. I knew that the Senator from South Carolina was not opposed to legislation prohibiting the granting of passes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. FORAKER. He so stated in committee and in the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I ask that the amendment be again read.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to say this offhand. I do not feel willing to accept any amendment. I want to be able to examine it; and then I am compelled to go around and get at least seven of my colleagues on the committee, however they may have been aligned heretofore on other subjects, to agree to it before I have any authority to accept anything for the committee. If the Senate will give me permission to accept amendments individually, I will begin to study them up and get ready, but I do not imagine that privilege is going to be accorded to me. But I want to say here and now that I am informed by my friend the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who has had a great deal of experience and who has given this particular phase of railroad rate regulation a great deal of study, that he has a bill or an amendment which he is incubating, which is far more comprehensive and sweeping than this one; and I assure the Senator from Ohio that before this bill is voted on we will have something, either his own amendment or that of the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from Wisconsin, which I hope will stop this great abuse.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move to add, after the word "indirectly," on page 1, line 2 of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, the words "issue any free pass, or shall directly or indirectly;" so that it will read in this respect:

That no carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall directly or indirectly issue any free pass, or shall directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, etc.

Mr. FORAKER. I accept the amendment. I am perfectly satisfied to have those words go in.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Texas that he had better include the words "free ticket," because certainly at one time that has been a very common method of issuing passes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will accept the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. FORAKER. I will accept it, also.

Mr. FULTON. If I may be allowed to make a suggestion, I suggest that the term "free transportation" be used. I think that it covers more than "ticket" or "pass."

Mr. TELLER. How is that?

Mr. FULTON. "Free transportation."

Mr. TELLER. That would cover it.

Mr. CULBERSON. As we are in an accommodating disposition, I think the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon is a good one, and so far as I am concerned I am willing to accept it, so that it will read:

That no carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall, directly or indirectly, issue any free transportation, or by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, etc.

Mr. FORAKER. Allow me to suggest to the Senator, why not use the words "issue any free pass or ticket or transportation?" That certainly will cover it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. We have defined "transportation" in the first section, so as to include a ticket. I think the words "pass or ticket" had better be left in.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that this might be much better: Suppose he and the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Wisconsin should get together and draft a separate bill, and we will pass it by unanimous consent, and let it go on its way rejoicing to the other end of the Capitol, because I am afraid there may be some trouble with the provision surviving in the mêlée that I foresee in regard to the various propositions to amend the Hepburn bill.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Some Senators suggest that it might weigh the bill down. I want to see who will fight this proposition in the open.

Mr. FORAKER. There need not be any trouble on that account. This is a very simple proposition, and it certainly ought to be in the bill. The statement made by the Senator from Iowa that the present provision has been ineffective is excuse enough for putting in this better provision. If in the way I have framed it it is not sufficiently drastic, let the Senator from Wisconsin or the Senator from Texas, or anybody else, aim to make it more so. I have no pride of authorship about it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest to the Senator to allow the amendment to go over until to-morrow and have it printed with the amendments which have been suggested by Senators, and then we will have the eagle eye of the Senator from Wisconsin upon it, and when he gets through with it I will warrant it will shoot.

Mr. FORAKER. Just one word. I brought up this amendment not with the idea of unduly crowding it upon the attention of the Senate, but there seemed to be a lack of interest just for the moment in the consideration of the bill; the Senator from South Carolina was calling for those who had something to say about it to come forward, and I thought I would call attention to this amendment, and I give notice that I am going to press it. I am not going to wait for any other bill or any other amendment. It is to go on this bill unless it is voted down. That is a sure thing if I live.

Mr. TILLMAN. I welcome the assistance of the Senator in making it effective in this one particular. I hope he will be equally zealous in helping us along other lines other people are clamoring for.

Mr. FORAKER. I am going to help all I can. I pressed this amendment in committee, but there we were short one vote, and I could not get it on.

Mr. ALLISON. May I interrupt the Senator from Ohio for a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to state that in committee only a majority of one was in favor of this great amendment of his?

Mr. KEAN. We lacked one.

Mr. ALLISON. One vote, which would mean only a bare majority in committee for this amendment?

Mr. FORAKER. What I said was that I pressed it in the committee, but it was impossible in the committee to amend the bill in any particular.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, I see.

Mr. FORAKER. It was not because the committee were all opposed to it. As I stated, the Senator from South Carolina voted against any amendment in the committee, but he was in favor of this particular amendment; and we reported the bill out of the committee, with the understanding all around the table that every Senator should feel free to offer such amendments as he chose.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am glad the Senator from Ohio corrected his first statement——

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to say just one word.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to remark that I am glad the Senator from Ohio has corrected the first statement he made, which would have led to the impression that the committee, or some members of it, at least, were opposed to this particular amendment. I did not hear a solitary member say a word in opposition to it, but owing to the deadlock which had come about there, we voted down every and all amendments or propositions to change the Hepburn bill, because we found that we could not do anything in any effective way, and brought the bill into the Senate so that we could get discussion and the consideration here which may be necessary, I suppose, to lick it into shape.

Mr. FORAKER. That is true. Perhaps I was not as careful in my words as I should have been. That is the exact truth about it, and that is the way I intended to state it.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me one moment more, I understood the fact in the committee to be as now stated by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from South Carolina, in charge of the bill. I understand it to be the rule of the committee not to explain on the floor of the Senate the details of the action of the committee.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly——

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will indulge me one moment more, I think this amendment may not reach precisely what the Senators have in view. I say this for the reason that when the original act of 1887 was passed it was generally understood at that time that the exceptions which are now embodied in the amendment and were substantially embodied in the original act precluded the idea of any other transportation except equal transportation being issued by railroads. I think that was the understanding for some years after that act was passed. For some reason that provision of the act never in any way was brought before the courts. I do not know that there is any adverse decision upon that subject. I do not know that the courts ever had an opportunity of deciding upon that form of discrimination. I think if they ever had they probably would have decided that the original law embraced that idea.

I know we have a similar law on the statute books in my own State, and for two or three years after its passage free transportation was not issued by the railroads, but afterwards that lapsed into desuetude, or whatever would be the proper word to explain it, and now our legislature in Iowa are endeavoring to correct its phraseology so as to make it certain. I think it ought to be made certain, and perhaps there should be a penalty—indeed, I think there ought to be—beyond the railroad as it affects the transportation.

Mr. FORAKER. There is not any doubt but that it was intended to prohibit the granting of passes by the provision found in the act of 1887, neither is there any doubt but that that provision proved ineffecive simply because there was no penalty imposed. Now, if the railroad grants a pass it will be subject to a penalty of from $100 to $2,000, and that will break up the business.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina in charge of the bill if he will not accept the amendment I have offered, and which I now send to the desk to have read.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, before passing from the amendment that is offered by the Senator from Ohio——

Mr. SCOTT. I ask for the reading of my amendment, if the Senator will excuse me, just to have the amendment read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. SCOTT. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Amend the bill by adding a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That all common carriers subject to the provision of this act shall provide at all points of connection, crossings, or intersections at grade, where it is practicable and necessary for interstate traffic, ample facilities by track connection for transferring any cars loaded in the regular business of their respective lines of road from their lines or tracks to those of any other common carrier whose lines or tracks may connect with, cross, or intersect their own, and shall provide equal and reasonable facilities for the interchange of cars and traffic between their respective lines, and for the receiving, forwarding and delivery of passengers, property, and cars to and from their several lines and those of other common carriers connected therewith, and shall permit switch or short-road connections to mines and other industrial plants to connect with its line where it is practicable and necessary, for the movement of interstate traffic, and shall not discriminate in their rates or charges or in the supply of cars between such connecting lines, switches, or short roads, or on freight coming over such lines, switches, or short roads; but this shall not be construed as requiring any common carrier to furnish for another common carrier or for switch or short roads herein authorized its tracks, equipment, or terminal facilities without reasonable compensation; that each of said connecting lines shall pay its proportionate share for the building and maintenance of such tracks and switches as may be necessary to furnish the transfer facilities required by this act, except switch and short-road connections to mines or other industrial plants shall be built and maintained at the cost of the party or parties interested in making such connections, and in case they can not agree on the amount which each line shall pay, or the right to connect said switch or short line as hereinbefore provided, then said amount and the right to connect with the line of said common carrier shall, upon application of either party, be determined and adjusted by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and any party shall have the right to review the order of said Commission determining the right of a switch or short road to make connection as hereinbefore provided or in fixing the proportionate amount to be paid by each carrier as herein provided, by filing a petition in the circuit court for the district where such transfer facilities are furnished or authorized, by serving notice in writing on the adverse party within ten days after the making and filing of such order by said Commission, and upon the service of such notice there shall be regarded as pending in said circuit court a civil action for the adjustment and determination of the amount to be paid by each carrier for the expense of the building and maintaining of the said transfer facilities or the right under this act to make connections of said switch or short road. Pleadings shall be made and filed in said action in conformity with those required by law and rules of the practice in said court.

Mr. SCOTT. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will accept that amendment. I understand the Supreme Court has decided very recently that a similar law in Minnesota is constitutional. Consequently there could be no objection to this amendment to the Hepburn bill. It would certainly be of a great deal of advantage to my State. I am sure the Senator from South Carolina is very much interested in our State. I hope, therefore, he will accept this as an amendment to the bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly; I was going to make a remark and then give the floor up in a minute, and the Senator can occupy it in his own right.

Mr. McLAURIN. Before we pass from the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio——

Mr. TILLMAN. I can wait. The Senator can have the floor.

Mr. McLAURIN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio and of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that there was no vote taken by the committee on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, or at least there was no vote taken while I was present. As I remember, there were a number of amendments offered to the bill in the committee by pretty well all the Senators who compose the committee. They were printed and they were to be considered at a time thereafter; but I think the Senator's memory and that of the Senator from Wisconsin and also of the Senator from South Carolina will bear me out that there was no vote taken on this amendment; and, as stated by the Senator from South Carolina, I do not think there was any objection to it manifested by any member of the committee.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator is quite right about that. I stated a few moments ago that if my first statement was not as broad as that, it should have been. It was not intended to misrepresent what occurred. This amendment was offered in the committee and it was explained and presented to the committee, and everything was done preliminary to a vote; but before we reached the point of taking a vote on it, as well as on a number of other amendments, a motion was made which terminated the consideration entirely by reporting the bill without amendment. I did not hear any Senator say he was opposed to it, but somehow or other the bill got through the House without any prohibition against passes, and it got through the committee without any prohibition against passes, and it may get through the Senate without it.

Mr. TILLMAN. It did not get through the committee; it ran over the committee.

Mr. FORAKER. I accept that.

Mr. McLAURIN. I desire to add that I had some amendments myself which were offered in the committee and were printed with the amendments offered by the other Senators on the committee, and that not one of my amendments was voted on any more than the amendments offered by the other Senators.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, in reply to the proposal of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] that I should accept the amendment which he had read a moment ago, I will say that for reasons already given I am not in a position to accept any amendment. I will join the Senator gladly in trying to get an effective provision in the bill which will remedy the condition that exists not only in West Virginia, but elsewhere, in regard to the denial by the great railways of the physical connection and opportunity to engage in interstate commerce as outlined in the Red Rock Fuel Company case, which the Senator has heard of several times from me and wants me to repeat every day. I have brought it up as an illustration of a great outrage that obtained in railroad management, and I will certainly assist him to the extent of my vote and counsel in securing a most thorough and effective remedy for it, because that is one thing that ought to be destroyed.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, as no Senator seems desirous of speaking upon the general features of the bill at this time and as we seem to be endeavoring to find some amendment to the bill upon which we all agree and which we may adopt, and therefore accomplish something to-day, and as the Senator from South Carolina is not authorized to accept any amendment, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration and a vote on the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, I do not understand that the Senator in charge of the bill is without authority to accept amendments. They are always accepted, provided there be no objection on the part of Senators. He does not accept on behalf of the committee, according to my observation and according to my understanding of the rule in that particular. The Senator in charge of the bill, when an amendment is offered, can state to the Senate that without objection he accepts the same.

Mr. TILLMAN. Just let me understand——

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want to press it. I only want to have an understanding.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Texas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to know the parliamentary status, or, rather, the privileges of the man in charge of the bill. This is the first baby I have ever had to nurse and guide through this labyrinth of Senatorial legislation, and therefore I am green. I have noticed that in the ordinary course of work a Senator in charge of a bill from a committee which has authorized him by a majority vote to bring the bill into the Senate and conduct it has felt willing and able to declare, when an amendment was offered, that he accepted it, which he did, of course, supposing that the committee would sustain him. Am I right? I should like the Senator from Iowa, the Nestor of the Senate, to tell me.

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator for the compliment. That is not the usual form. The usual form is to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if this amendment or that amendment can not be adopted by unanimous consent. The person in charge of the bill usually says there is no objection to it, and if nobody else objects then it perhaps goes into the bill, as a rule.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. By unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLISON. It is done by the unanimous consent of the Senate. I do not understand that the rule permits any Senator to accept an amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Not even the chairman of a committee who is in charge of a bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly, I think, neither the chairman nor anyone in the Senate can accept an amendment. I think it can only be done by the chairman or Senator in charge asking unanimous consent that it may be accepted. The Senator from Texas has endeavored to conform to what is the usual custom by asking unanimous consent now. He will pardon me for illustrating it by his proposal. He has asked unanimous consent that an amendment, whatever it is—I suppose it is an important one—shall be taken up and considered at this time. He does not ask for its present adoption at this time, but that the consideration shall continue until it is adopted or rejected. That is the rule.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is perfectly agreeable to me. If we can transfer the debate on the general subject to some particular branch of the subject, it may be that we shall get the debaters at work.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will indulge me one moment, I have welcomed the amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] and the amendment suggested by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], because it gives the body of the Senate an opportunity to know what amendments are pending and what is the purpose of those amendments. So, I think, in the absence of arguments as respects the contested portions of the bill, it is a wise thing that the time of the Senate shall be expended in the discussion and consideration of amendments brought forward by different Senators. I hope the Senate will adopt that rule.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Texas will indulge me a little further, I was going to remark that I have noticed, when we have had bills here, like the statehood bill, for instance, all the amendments which were offered were all held in abeyance; they might be discussed or considered by individual Senators, but they were never voted on until the day when the whole thing was to be decided. I have felt that that is a very unwise course. It is not according to my ideas of deliberation and of proper consideration of amendments.

For instance, I saw the other day, on the statehood bill, the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] in regard to the capital voted down just because most Senators said, "Well, we do not know what it is, and we do not want to be voting in the dark." As soon as we had an opportunity to explain it, the amendment went through.

But I was going to suggest that, if the Senate will permit me, whenever we reach a day when we are to vote, I am going to ask the Senate for two or three days preceding to take up all proposed amendments in some order which may be agreed on, and let the Senator who introduced an amendment get up and explain the purpose and object of it, and let us discuss it pro and con, back and forth, under the five or ten minute rule, or something like that. Then we will be enlightened and know what we are doing; and we should do that rather than undertake to dispose of the whole batch, fifteen or twenty or thirty amendments in a lump, shooting them like you shoot birds.

Mr. LODGE. The practice in regard to amendments of which the Senator speaks I think only prevails after we have come to a unanimous agreement to fix the time for taking the vote. Until we have agreed to fix a time for taking the final vote, which carries the bill and all amendments forward, we can vote on any amendment at any time.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to make only one suggestion. I am perfectly willing for that course to be pursued. I would be willing and glad to make progress along any line looking to the perfecting of this measure; but unless the Senate is notified to that effect, Senators who might want to oppose any amendment will not have an opportunity to do so. For instance, this evening I notice that there are possibly twenty-five or thirty of our Senators who are missing. They are engaged on other matters, probably of importance, and are not here. Before we undertake to vote on any amendment, however unanimous we may be in regard to it, I should think it would be nothing more than fair play to give everyone an opportunity, and to notify Senators if they want to keep amendments they object to from passing they had better be on hand and stay here.

Mr. FORAKER. What the Senator suggests is perfectly satisfactory to me. I wanted to present this amendment. As has been already remarked, no opposition was developed to it in the committee, and I thought perhaps the Senator might feel disposed to accept it. Certainly in the absence of objection I supposed he could, and there being no objection, it would be adopted and be out of the way. I have a number of other amendments which I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate hereafter, and those I can get out of the way before I come to those I want to have disposed of.

Mr. TILLMAN. I shall be more than glad to help the Senator get his amendment before the Senate, and if unanimous consent is given to vote on it I shall certainly help the Senator to nail his plank down on the floor or else throw it out of the window.

Mr. TELLER and others addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield further?

Mr. CULBERSON. To whom?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To any Senator desiring the floor. The Senator from Texas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. If the Senator from Colorado will pardon a word——

Mr. TELLER. I want to find out what is the status of the amendments.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am proposing an amendment which the Secretary has in hand and is ready to read.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator from Texas what his request is?

Mr. CULBERSON. I am about to propose an amendment. As I had suggested, as there was a lull in the proceedings, no Senator desiring to speak upon the bill generally, I was endeavoring to see if we could not pass some amendment, to which I think there is no objection. Certainly none has been made to me so far. I ask now that the amendment which I have proposed may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

Mr. CULLOM. Is it an amendment which has been pending heretofore?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield further?

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I still ask the Senator from Texas just what his entire request is, for the reason that some Senators upon this side, myself included, were not sure that we understood the Senator's request, which we thought was to presently consider the amendment the Senator now offers and to vote upon the same. Was that the Senator's request?

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not remember the exact language I used. My request now is for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the amendment, with the hope that we may pass it immediately and promptly.

Mr. CULLOM. I will inquire of the Senator if it is a new amendment or one which has been already pending?

Mr. CULBERSON. I understood that it had been passed over.

Mr. CULLOM. May I ask the Senator if the amendment which he now proposes has been heretofore offered?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes; it has been heretofore offered, and I ask that the Secretary may now be allowed to read it.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine rises to a point of order, which he will state.

Mr. FRYE. The bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and I know of nothing to prevent any Senator from offering any amendment while the bill is in Committee of the Whole which he desires to offer—not the slightest. The Senator from Texas has a right under the rule to do so.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I understand, in a general way, that there is a rule to which the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has referred. My purpose is to take up the amendment by general consent; in other words, I do not care to press it if anyone desires to speak upon it, but I hope it may be read at least, and that it may be passed promptly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Secretary reads the amendment I wish to say that I have made an effort as to my amendment. I do not know whether it has been disposed of or not. I understand, however, that it has not been. If my amendment has been disposed of, I should like to know what disposition was made of it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What was the Senator's amendment?

Mr. FORAKER. I offered an amendment to the bill, and I should like to have it acted on by the Senate. If Senators are not ready to act upon it, I am willing to let it go over; but I should like it to be out of the way before the Senator from Texas proposes his amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio has proposed an amendment, but the Chair understood the Senator to desire that his amendment should lie over. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Ohio desired a vote on it at present.

Mr. FORAKER. I signified my willingness to let it go over if the Senator in charge of the bill was not at this time prepared to have it acted upon.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not feel that I would be treating absent Senators with fairness to allow any important amendment to be voted on this evening. Of course the Senate will do as it pleases, but simply as a matter of fairness to those who are absent and who have had no notice, I think it ought to be understood that the Senate is in a humor to take up these amendments, discuss them, and vote upon them. Every Senator is at liberty to be absent or to be here, as he sees fit, and take the consequences of having something go through that he does not like, or fail to get something on the bill that he does like. But I do not feel that any Senator is warranted, under existing conditions, in pressing anything to a vote this evening, and I hope no Senator will do so.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not feel warranted in doing so, but I give notice that I shall press the amendment hereafter.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to say, in view of the statement of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which does not contravene anything that I have said, that I shall not press the consideration of this amendment or a vote on it this afternoon, but I certainly am entitled to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas has a right to have his amendment read and to ask for a vote upon it. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That no corporation, joint stock company, or other association engaged in foreign or interstate commerce and subject to the provisions of this act, or of the acts of which it is amendatory, shall directly or indirectly, contribute, or promise to contribute, any money, stock, bonds, transportation, or other thing of value to any committee, or any member of a committee of any political party, or to any person for the purpose of influencing the result of any political campaign, or to any person, or committee, or organization for the purpose of influencing the result of any legislation pending before either branch of the Congress of the United States, or any committee thereof. That any violation of this section shall constitute a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof the corporation, joint stock company, or other association shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000, and a further fine in addition to the foregoing of not less than amount than double the value of the money or other thing of value contributed, or promised to be contributed, in violation of this section.

Any person who shall, acting for or on behalf of any such corporation, joint stock company, or association, directly or indirectly, contribute, or promise to contribute, any money, stock, bonds, transportation, or other thing of value to any committee, or to any member of a committee of any political party, or to any person for the purpose of influencing the result of any political campaign, or to any person or committee or organization for the purpose of influencing the result of any legislation pending before either branch of the Congress of the United States or any committee thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and in addition thereto shall be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not understand that the Senator from Texas proposes that a vote shall be taken on that amendment to-night.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no.

Mr. KEAN. Not until to-morrow, at any rate.

Mr. TELLER. I should hardly think it would be appropriate, although I suppose, under the rules, the Senator from Texas is entitled to have a vote if the Senate does not declare otherwise. But by the custom that has grown up here we have been in the habit of leaving all important amendments, not reported by a committee, but offered by members of the body, until practically the debate has been concluded on the main issue, and that, I presume, will be the rule now, although of course any Senator can call up an amendment offered by him on any day, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] suggests, and have it voted on if the Senate is willing to vote on it.

Mr. President, in the case of the statehood bill we provided that a vote should be taken on a certain day at a certain hour, commencing with the vote on the amendments. That did not leave any opportunity for any Senator to discuss or explain an amendment. Ordinarily I think the rule has been that we have taken up amendments, with a brief opportunity of five or ten or fifteen minutes to discuss or explain them.

I want to say as to this bill, Mr. President, that when the time comes, when the Senator who has the bill in charge calls for it, I hope he will give us an opportunity when amendments are proposed to have a few moments, so that the Senator who has proposed a particular amendment may explain what it is, and so that we shall not be in the position we were in on the statehood bill, when we were obliged to vote for or against amendments practically without knowing what they were.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator a question? Is it not true that any Senator has a right to discuss an amendment offered by him or by any other Senator at any time after the bill itself is up for consideration on any day? Is it not true, that we do not have to wait to discuss the amendments until some time is fixed to discuss them under the five-minute, ten-minute, or any other kind of a rule?

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] did not have to ask, as I understand, unanimous consent for present consideration of his amendment. We may discuss amendments at any time, may we not?

After the bill is made unfinished business or whenever it is under discussion, any Senator may debate any amendment quite as freely as the bill itself. An order to debate amendments under the ten-minute rule for several days before a vote, is a limitation on debate and not the granting of any larger privileges of debate. The Senator from Texas need ask no one's consent to consider his amendment. It is his by right. Is not that true?

Mr. TELLER. That is true. After a bill has become the regular order before the Senate any Senator may offer an amendment to it; he may discuss his amendment and call for a vote upon it if he sees fit to do so; but of course the Senate will not vote upon it if there has not been proper discussion.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. FRYE. Does not the Senator from Colorado regard the proposition made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] as a very agreeable one? That was that eventually a time shall be fixed for the final vote on the bill and all amendments that may then be pending, but that there shall be two or three days assigned for debate, under the ten-minute rule, on all amendments before a final vote is taken on the bill and the amendments.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have seen that done very often.

Mr. FRYE. Does not the Senator think that is a very wise provision?

Mr. TELLER. That would depend on how many amendments are pending. It would depend somewhat on the length of time it took to discuss each amendment, and it would depend somewhat on the condition of the business of the Senate. But what I think is a fair proposition is that when an amendment is before the Senate, before it is voted upon, some Senator may have an opportunity to say at that time what that amendment means. I have said as much as I want to say on that point. So far as I am concerned, such an arrangement as I have suggested will have to be made if we agree in this case to vote.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say a word or two about the amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. Only for a moment. I understood the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to extend beyond what is now suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I agree with the Senator from South Carolina that it would be a wise thing on a bill of this character to take up the important amendments; that we have three of four days to debate those amendments separately; then that we dispose of one amendment at a time and then go on to another. I think that is a wiser and a better method of disposing of some of the questions connected with this bill. There are probably two or three crucial amendments in the bill. After the general debate has been exhausted they will require still a more limited debate as to the effect of their phraseology, and there will undoubtedly be suggestions of change, which ought also to be debated. So I think in any important bill the wise thing is to take up important amendments, debate each one of them for a limited time, then vote upon them, and then go on to the others.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to remark, Mr. President, that there seems to be a flagging in the general debate on the great subject, the whole subject, and Senators are pressing their individual amendments. The Senator from Iowa recognizes the fact that while he and I could probably agree as to what are the important amendments, every member who has introduced an amendment here thinks it important, and wants to be heard on it. I hope Senators who are not prepared or willing or ready to proceed with the discussion of the Hepburn bill as it is written, but who wants to discuss amendments, will be prepared to take the amendments up and let us vote on them when we get through discussing them. For instance, it would be a very silly thing for us to discuss the amendment just offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] for a day or a half day, or whatever other time it took to get the views of different Senators, and then let it pass off until the week after next or some time in May before we vote on it. The minds of Senators would have been absorbed with other conflicting ideas and they would not be able to vote as they might vote if the vote was taken immediately after the discussion.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has the floor, and I am only occupying it by his courtesy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TELLER. I yield, though I had just yielded to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TILLMAN. Let me finish, and I will then give way to the Senator from Mississippi. My idea was this——

Mr. McLAURIN. If the Senator from South Carolina will allow me, I merely want to make a suggestion right there in relation to the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Colorado will kindly yield, I will yield.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. McLAURIN. I want to state to the Senator from South Carolina that, so far as I am concerned as a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I am willing to accept, or authorize the Senator in charge of this bill to accept, the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas. I do not suppose that amendment will provoke any debate. I think there can be no reasonable objection to the amendment, and we might dispose of that much of the work in the consideration of the bill at this time. If the other members of the committee are willing to authorize the Senator in charge of the bill to accept the amendment, so far as the committee is concerned, the Senator might do so, and then, if there be no objection to it, the amendment might be disposed of.

Mr. TILLMAN. I would prefer not to vote on anything this evening, because there has been no notice that we proposed to do that. I think it would be nothing but fair as to absent Senators, who may feel a deep interest in these proposed amendments, to let them understand that the Senate is in a business mood, that it proposes to do business, and that they had better be around and attend to their business. Therefore I will ask Senators not to press for a vote this evening; and then to-morrow, if any Senator feels disposed after this discussion and notice to bring up an amendment, to speak on it, and to ask a vote on it, that is his right under the rules, as we have been told by the President pro tempore [Mr. FRYE]. That would be perfectly agreeable to me, because we would be thrashing out some of this great mass of matter that is pending, and the more of it we get through with now the less there will be to handle at the wind up.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I only desire to say to the Senator from South Carolina that I did not propose a vote on this amendment; but in the event that there was no objection to it, it might be accepted not only by the committee, but by the Senate, and that it might be adopted without objection.

Mr. TILLMAN. But does not the Senator see there is not a majority of the Committee on Interstate Commerce present, and how could I accept it?

Mr. LODGE. Acceptance by the committee——

Mr. CULLOM. It would be left in the hands of the Senate to determine whether it would accept it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. HALE. What I wanted of the Senator from Colorado was to give me an opportunity of making a practical suggestion——

Mr. TELLER. I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. HALE. Or what I think is a practical suggestion to the Senator from South Carolina who is managing the bill, and who is managing it well. I will not say that is a surprise to any one; but within the observation of everybody here, this is rather an extensive subject. As we proceed in the debate and as amendments are suggested, it is found to be involving a great many important considerations. Now, I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina, in managing the details of the bill, instead of confining what will be the illuminating debate at the close of the discussion to two or three days, that he, in his own thorough and careful way prepare a suggestion, or what would be in effect a rule, by which the last, not two or three days, but the last week, or the last five or six days, shall be devoted to debate upon the amendments under the ten-minute rule.

The amendments are the vital things. Everybody sees that the decision finally of this matter must depend upon the amendments offered and the action taken upon them. Let the Senator prepare an order, such as I have suggested, providing that when an amendment is reached during those five or six days it shall occupy so much time, be debated so long, and then be voted upon; but that opportunity shall be given for Senators to make short speeches upon the critical and vital things that are in this bill.

I do not think five or six days will be too much for that; and I hope the Senator will be able to get the unanimous consent of the Senate, after he has prepared that order, that a period of five or six days be devoted to the discussion of the amendments under the ten-minute rule, and that that time shall be reached pretty soon. In that way we shall not spend too much time in what I may call the parturition of these great speeches.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Maine will permit me, and through the courtesy of the Senator from Colorado, I may say that the Senator from Maine made a remark a moment ago in regard to what he termed the "illuminating debate." I hope he will take the responsibility for describing whose speeches would be embraced in that classification, because I should not like to do it.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senate generally will join in that debate.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senate will join generally in that debate. I wish to say here that the information we have gained on this question from the elaborate speeches already made is most essential and most important. I think the general discussion by the longer speeches has been very useful. I think if we ever arrive at a conclusion and reach a vote, it will be in the limitation of those speeches and in the beginning of the actual consideration of the amendments to the bill. That is where the test will come.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator at this point. I did wish to interrupt him at the point he was on when I rose. I wanted to call his attention to the fact that almost every amendment offered here calls for some discussion—perhaps not a great deal, but certainly some. For instance, the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas is a very important one in some of its legal aspects. I wanted to ask the Senator, for illustration, under what power conferred on Congress by the Constitution does he offer this amendment?

Mr. HALE. Let me say right there——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. The Senator has——

Mr. TELLER. I believe I have the floor, and I am not disposed to allow myself to be taken off the floor.

Mr. HALE. I am holding the floor by permission of the Senator from Colorado.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] yielded to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. TELLER. But by the rule of the Senate the Senator from Maine has no right to yield to anyone else. However, I am not finding any fault now——

Mr. HALE. The Senator is entirely right about it.

Mr. TELLER. I simply want to preserve the rule.

Mr. FORAKER. And I feel I ought to be allowed to apologize to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator does not need to do that.

Mr. FORAKER. I was engaged in reading and studying the amendment of the Senator from Texas, and I supposed the Senator from Maine had the floor. I did not know the Senator from Colorado was entitled to it.

Mr. HALE. No; the Senator from Colorado commands the floor. I am now speaking in his time.

Without taking any more time, I will say that I had in view in my proposition just the suggestion that has been made by the Senator from Ohio, that each of these amendments is important, and if we go on in the old way the whole time will be consumed by long, good, and able speeches, and we would get no opportunity to consider each amendment. When the Senator from South Carolina has prepared his order that will settle how we shall proceed, I do not think that five or six days is too much time to be given under the ten-minute rule to debate on the amendments. The Senator can arrange his order so that when each amendment is reached it shall occupy so much time and no more, and then be voted upon.

I do not say the Senator can submit that order to-day, but it is worth while for him to think it over, to the end that pretty soon he may bring in an order which shall determine the course of the debate and the consideration of this subject, which will but give ample time to the discussion of the amendments. They are, as I have said—and I do not want to repeat myself—the important things in this bill, and it ought to be provided that what will be done in the way of amending the bill, if we amend it at all, shall be done after discussion.

Mr. CULLOM. As I understand the rule, or the common practice, we first determine the question whether we are prepared to fix a time to vote. After we fix the time, or in connection with that, an agreement is made generally to give so much time to amendments, the debate to proceed under the ten-minute rule, or something of that kind. The question now seems to me to be whether we are going to close this debate.

Mr. HALE. I suppose we can not reach that determination to-day.

Mr. CULLOM. No; but that is the first thing that ought to be reached, it seems to me.

Mr. TELLER. We can not reach that to-day.

Mr. HALE. That will be reached whenever the Senator from South Carolina in charge of the bill brings in his order as to precisely how much time shall be given to debate on the amendments. When the Senator gets such an order ready to present to the Senate, we may then agree on a time when we shall take the final vote.

Mr. CULLOM. I believe, with the Senator, that it is a very good thing to agree upon a time when the amendments shall be taken up under the ten-minute rule; but when the Senate makes that agreement, or before it does so, we have got to agree as to when we are going to close this discussion, it seems to me.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am very anxious to have the debate close and to get a vote on this bill. While I do not want to press things unduly or obstruct the ordinary course of discussion or of consideration of other measures, I should be glad—I know I can not get consent this evening—to ask the Senate to fix a date for a vote; but to-morrow, in the morning hour, when the Senate is full, I will ask the Senate to indicate, by unanimous consent, when it will be ready to vote, and then I will try to secure unanimous consent—which is the same as the order suggested by the Senator from Maine, of course; for whatever the unanimous consent provides, it will be an order of the Senate—by which the debate shall be controlled and conducted at the wind-up.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Colorado, but I want to ask a question of the Senator from Texas when the Senator from Colorado concludes.

Mr. TELLER. When I was interrupted by the senior Senator from Ohio I was about to say something in regard to the amendments. The Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Maine, lawyer, have so thoroughly disposed of the matter as to the particular character of the discussion, and so forth, that I do not care to say anything about it. But there are some other things that I do want to say, if I may be permitted to occupy the time of the Senate for a few moments.

At the last session of Congress the House sent here a bill which, it was supposed, would settle this rate question. The Senate, in the condition it then found itself, was not able to dispose of that bill, either favorably or otherwise. We have been charged ever since with having smothered the bill. At this session of Congress the House has sent another, and quite a different bill, to the Senate. I need not say here that the question is perhaps as difficult as any question we ever had before the Senate in the history of the body. I have said once before on the floor, and I repeat it, that in a body of ninety, composed mainly of lawyers—at least two-thirds of them lawyers—there is not one here who can sit down and agree with another exactly as to what the bill ought to be. One might agree to yield his judgment on some point, and, so, two men might agree; but I do not believe, if an opportunity were given every member of the Senate to draft a bill, that any two of the bills would be alike if their authors did not consult beforehand. That will indicate something about the difficulty of the bill we have before us. It is a House bill, and some Senators think it is our duty to adopt the bill as it came to us from the House. If that is the best bill that we can pass, then it is our duty to adopt it. If the original House bill is so good that we can not amend it with profit to the bill, then we ought not to amend it; but if the bill is not, in the judgment of the Senate, such a bill as we ought to pass, then it is the duty of the Senate, with time and with deliberation, to amend it. We find ourselves somewhat at sea on this subject. Those who are in favor of the principle, and who want to authorize the Commission to establish a rate and to give it effective establishment when it is made, do not know exactly how we are going to reach it.

I think perhaps the public is somewhat impatient, but we ourselves sometimes get impatient about things. There came in here to-day a joint resolution to remedy an evil that many of us have seen to exist for a long time, and that is the distribution of public documents. The distribution of public documents to-day is as it was thirty years ago—it is almost thirty years since my first connection with this body—except for some slight amendments that have been made; and yet we heard a demand for immediate action. Mr. President, there is no hurry about it. We will have the remainder of the session to dispose of that matter, and we will have the remainder of the session to dispose of this bill. I want to say that it is certain the Senate will not finally adjourn until the rate bill is disposed of, not only by the Senate, but by both Houses; and it will in some way have, I am sure, the approval of the President before the Senate adjourns.

Mr. President, the question is how to make it effective. Our friends in the House and those here who believe with them say that there is ample provision for a review by the court. Some Senators here, whose legal experience ought to entitle them to consideration, say otherwise. There ought not to be any great difficulty in a controversy of that kind. One side says the bill means this; somebody says it does not. We all want it to mean that. There is no one here who does not want, and does not know we are going to have, a review by the courts of the conduct of the Commission. Everybody knows that. I do not believe a Senator will rise here and say he does not want it. He may say, "I do not believe the bill needs any amendment, because it so provides now," but he will not say, believing otherwise, "I am opposed to any revision."

The junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who has been called away owing to a death in his family, a Senator whom we all recognize as a clear-headed lawyer, has put in an amendment which I believe will meet the acceptance of the Senate entirely, except as to one single provision in it, perhaps, and that is, have we the power to say that the order having been made it shall not by an interlocutory order or decree be disturbed until the final hearing. Mr. President, that is the issue which I think the Senate has to meet more than any other. When that is settled what kind of a review is to be had? My own judgment is that the less amendments offered to this bill the better it will be, unless it shall be discovered that there are some defects or deficiencies in it which endanger its existence, when, at no very distant day, it shall encounter, as it must, the scrutiny of the courts.

I do not myself want to see this bill complicated with a great many other things which may be useful. The President of the United States, as has been said to-day, has sent us two messages. In both he outlined the same thing—a rate making by the Commission whenever the Commission shall determine that the rate made by the railroad is not proper; a review by the courts; and the President says this rate is to stand until the court shall suspend it, or, in other words, declare that the Commission has made a mistake. There is the issue before the country. I do not believe the railroad people are especially controverting this question, except to insist that they shall have their day in court, and nobody, I repeat, wants to pass a law that does not give them their day in court.

Mr. President, this body has been charged with being a railroad organization, and it is alleged that there are railroad attorneys here. I have no doubt there are a large number of Senators here who have been railroad attorneys. Some of them may have been railroad presidents. In my early days, before I came to the Senate, I was president of a railroad, not a very big one, but I was president of it for five or six years and built the road. I was for years the attorney of a railroad. But when I came here I severed my connection with railroads, and I have no connections with them. But I know that the railroads have as much right to have their property defended as I have to have mine defended. I have no prejudice against railroads. I lived for years 650 miles beyond a railroad. I know what it means to reach the home of my youth by stage rides. I know how burdensome it was to us.

When the railroad came into our section of the country and charged us 10 cents a mile we paid it with satisfaction. It was cheaper than we had ever been able to travel before. It saved us time. It saved us labor. The railroads have built up that section of the country in which I live, which would be practically worthless without their aid. I do not intend that any demand from anybody shall make me do an injustice to that great interest which has done more for this country than any other single agency that can be suggested.

I do not intend, either, that the railroads shall abuse the shipper, the producer, or the consumer. I am not going to attack the railroads; I am not going to defend them, except to say that justice must be done to them in doing justice to every other man in this country. I am not impatient and I am not in a hurry to get away from here, nor I am going to be influenced by the allegation that the Senate is acting in the interests of corporations and railroads. When we get through with this bill, if we do our duty, we will have a bill that will accomplish what the people desire—that is, the regulation, not the destruction, of railroads; a regulation that shall benefit them, in my judgment, as it will benefit the producer and the consumer.

Mr. President, some time during the debate I expect to make a speech on the railroad question—that is to say, if in so doing I do not delay the measure unnecessarily. But I have my views upon this question. I should like to see this bill stripped of everything that is unnecessary. I should like to settle this question of our power to make rates and to prevent discrimination and rebates, practically disposed of in this bill, and with the other questions I will take chances when they come before the Senate and the House, that these bodies will do justice not only to the railroads, but to the people.

That clamor and exaggeration and condemnation and all that are going on I know. You can not pick up a magazine any more without seeing the Senate arraigned and sometimes abused because we have not hastened the passage of this bill, and because at the last session we did not take up the House bill and pass it. I said then that we could not do justice to the railroads and pass it then; we could not do justice to the shippers and pass it then; we could not do justice to the producer and consumer, who are to be considered, because every industry in this country depends upon the way in which we shall settle the proposition involved in the pending bill. You may affect the manufacturers, you may affect the miners, you may affect the farmers injuriously if you are unwise in your determination as to what this bill shall contain. A great question like that is too big for us to haggle over amendments of a minor character and of little consequence. Let us address ourselves to the main proposition: How shall we, in case a railroad refuses or neglects or is unable to make a proper rate, determine what is a proper rate and one that will do no injustice to the railroad or to anyone else.

Mr. President, I did not get up to make any remarks on this bill, but simply to talk about the order with which it ought to be disposed of. Probably it would have been just as well if I had not said anything beyond that. I want to say again that

I have the utmost confidence that the Senate will take this bill and try to make as good a bill as can be made. I have an idea that if there is any body in this world capable of doing it, the Senate is capable of doing its share and its part.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to submit an amendment to the bill under consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 17, after the word "or" where it first appears in said line, strike out the word "unjustly," and after the word "or" where it appears in said line for the second time, strike out the word "unduly."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to offer another amendment, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho proposes another amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 19, on page 3, insert:

That section 4 of the said act be amended by striking out the words "on substantially similar circumstances and conditions;" in lines 4 and 5 strike out the proviso in said section 4; so that said section will read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for the transportation of passengers or of like kinds of property for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge or receive as great compensation for a shorter than a longer distance."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 27, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—CURTIS P. IAOKEA AGAINST JONAH K. KALANIANAOLE.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. I am directed by the Committee on Elections No. 3 to submit to the House the report and the resolutions in the contested-election case of Curtis P. Iaokea against Jonah K. Kalaniamaole, coming from the Territory of Hawaii. This report is signed by a majority of the members, although not all of the members concur in all the arguments or statements in it. In just one paragraph or statement there is some disagreement, but all the members of this committee concur in the conclusion and in the resolutions which are herewith submitted.

Mr. Speaker, in submitting the report and resolutions in this case to the House, I beg leave to accompany it with a few remarks on the propriety, and even the necessity, of amending the election laws of the Territory of Hawaii; and wish to call the attention of the House, and especially of the Committee on the Territories to this matter.

In the consideration of this election contest, and in the preparation of the report, we have been required to examine somewhat carefully not only the laws of the Territory of Hawaii, but also the joint resolution providing for the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States and the organic act providing for the government of the Territory of Hawaii. After such study and examination several of the members of this committee have reached the conclusion that there is no law, at all events no clear or definite law or procedure, providing for the election of a Delegate from the Territory of Hawaii to the Congress of the United States. We are also of the opinion that the organic act providing for the government of the Territory of Hawaii should be so amended and supplemented as to clearly provide the ways and means for the election of such Delegate, or by an act of Congress the Territorial legislature of Hawaii should be empowered to make such amendments to its election law as may be necessary and proper to provide fully for such election.

I will briefly refer to the statutes, and cite with my remarks such portions of them as, in my judgment, establish my position, that there is now no complete law for the election of a Delegate, and that the Hawaiian legislature has no power to amend or supplement its present law, or make a new and independent law, providing for the election of such Delegate.

The joint resolution by the Congress, providing for the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States, was adopted on the 7th day of July, 1898; and the law providing for the government of the Territory of Hawaii, known as the "organic act," was not passed until April 30, 1900. This organic act is, in substance, a constitution, or a fundamental law, for the government of the islands. By it certain powers are reserved to the Congress, and certain powers are expressly given to the Hawaiian legislature, and certain limitations are imposed on the powers of such legislature; and such legislature is restricted in the scope of its enactments to the jurisdiction and powers expressly granted to it by the organic act.

Section 85 of this organic act provides:

That a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve during each Congress, shall be elected by the voters qualified to vote for members of the house of representatives of the legislature; such Delegate shall possess the qualifications necessary for membership of the senate of the legislature of Hawaii. The times, places, and manner of holding elections shall be as fixed by law. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared by the governor duly elected, and a certificate shall be given accordingly. Every such Delegate shall have a seat in the House of Representatives with the right of debate, but not of voting.

Section 6 of that act provides:

That the laws of Hawaii not inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of the United States or the provisions of this act shall continue in force, subject to repeal or amendment by the legislature of Hawaii or the Congress of the United States.

Then section 64 of said act provides:

That the rules and regulations for administering oaths and holding elections, set forth in Ballou's Compilation, Civil Laws, Appendix, and the list of registry districts and precincts appended, are continued in force with the following changes, to wit—

Then are set forth the "changes," which were made necessary by the transfer of the islands from their republican form of government to their present status as a Territory of the United States, and no provision is there made for the election of a Delegate to the Congress.

Section 55 of said act, under the head of "Legislative power," provides:

That the legislative power of the Territory shall be extended to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States locally applicable.

Then follows in this section a long enumeration of those legislative powers, which, among other things, provide for the reapportionment of the membership in the senate and house of representatives of the Hawaiian legislature among the senatorial and representative districts of the islands on the basis of population. But nowhere in this list of powers is authority given to the Hawaiian legislature to formulate an independent law for the election of Delegate, or to so amend or supplement its pending law as to accomplish the same purpose.

Then section 65 provides:

That the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii may from time to time establish and alter the boundaries of election districts and voting precincts, and apportion the senators and representatives to be elected from such districts.

It is a fair inference that the powers conferred by the organic act on the Hawaiian legislature pertaining to the election of senators and representatives to such legislature are definitely limited and circumscribed. No provision in any of the powers or limitations provides the machinery for the election of a Delegate to the Congress, and there was no provision in the election law of the republic for that purpose, for there was no such officer.

Section 85 states the qualifications of electors who are entitled to vote for Delegate to Congress and the qualifications of such Delegate, and it says: "The times, places, and manner of holding elections shall be as fixed by law." What law? It can not mean the law made by the Republic and permitted and continued in force after annexation. It can hardly be claimed to refer to law contained in the organic act, for the only provisions for the election of Delegate are contained in section 85 and in section 14, which fixes the time for holding the election. If "as fixed by law" means a law to be made in the future, that should be done. This sentence certainly is very blind and has led to much confusion, and has already been a source of contention in two election contests coming from that Territory.

In the fall of 1900, after the passage of the organic act, an election was held in the islands for Delegate to Congress. Robert A. Wilcox received the certificate of election and came to the House of Representatives. His seat was contested on three grounds, one of which was that there was no valid election for a Delegate to Congress. The point was made that, since there was no machinery of election except that provided by the laws of the republic of Hawaii and section 85 of the organic act, no election could be held. The Committee on Elections did not concur with that view, but Mr. Taylor of Ohio, who drew the report, admitted that the point had much technical force. It came up again in this case, not directly as one of the grounds urged for setting aside the election, but incidentally in the argument and decision of the case. Aside from the Delegate, senators and representatives in the Hawaiian legislature are the only officers elected in the Territorial government, and the laws and the statutes for that purpose are clear and definite. They require that two suitable ballot boxes be provided for each election precinct; that one be marked, in plain letters, "For senators," and the other "For representatives." But no box for Delegate is provided for.

Section 85 of the organic act simply states that a Delegate to Congress shall be elected by the voters qualified to vote for members of the house of representatives of the legislature. It does not say how or in what manner such election must be held. But the Hawaiian statutes provide that its senators and representatives must be elected by ballot. There should be an amendment to cover this point and make the election uniform. The Hawaiian statute requires that the ballots for senators be of blue paper and the ballots for representatives be of white paper. In order to be complete and uniform it should state the color of the ballot for Delegate. Separate sections are devoted to the description of the ballots for senators and representatives, and in order that there may be symmetry and uniformity, a separate section should be incorporated describing the ballots for Delegate. Since no definite law or procedure is provided for the election of Delegate, the secretary of state of the territory has assumed the duty and responsibility of supplementing the Hawaiian statutes to accomplish that purpose. He furnished separate boxes and marked them "For Delegate." He had the ballots for Delegate printed on pink paper, and made other necessary provisions for the election of Delegate by ballot, and made them conform as far as possible to the laws there existing for the election of senators and representatives. But in this the secretary has been really performing the functions of a legislative body rather than those of an executive officer.

The attorneys from the Hawaiian Islands, representing the parties in this case, have expressed to me the opinion that the Hawaiian legislature has no power conferred upon it by the organic act to amend its statutes in this regard; and after quite a thorough examination I am persuaded to concur with their views. It will not be a difficult matter to amend this law; and it ought to be done during the present session of Congress, so that the election of the next Delegate may be simplified, and in this respect be entirely free from doubt.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Curtis P. Iaokea, the contestant, was not elected a Delegate to the Fifty-ninth Congress from the Territory of Hawaii.

Resolved, That Jonah K. Kalanianaole, the contestee, was duly elected a Delegate to the Fifty-ninth Congress from the Territory of Hawaii, and is entitled to a seat therein.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DRISCOLL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the District Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the District Calendar, with Mr. LACEY in the chair.

METROPOLITAN POLICE FORCE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 16484) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That section 1 of the act of Congress approved February 28, 1901, entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"PARAGRAPH 1. The Metropolitan police district of the District of Columbia shall be coextensive with the District of Columbia, and shall be subdivided into such police districts and precincts as the Commissioners of said District may from time to time direct.

"PAR. 2. The Commissioners of said District shall appoint to office, assign to such duty or duties as they may prescribe, and promote all officers and members of said Metropolitan police force according to such rules and regulations as said Commissioners in their exclusive jurisdiction and judgment may from time to time make, alter, or amend. Provided, That original appointments of privates on said police force at the time this act takes effect shall be classified as follows: Class 1: Privates who have served under their present appointments less than three years shall be included in class 1, and at the expiration of three years from the date of said appointment shall be promoted to class 2, if the conduct and intelligent attention to duty of such privates shall justify such promotion. Class 2: Privates who have served under their present appointments more than three years and less than five years shall be included in class 2; and after the expiration of five years from the date of said appointment shall be promoted to class 3, if the conduct and intelligent attention to duty of such privates shall justify such promotion. Class 3: Privates who have served under their present appointment more than five years shall be included in class 3. All original appointments of privates shall be made to class 1, and promotions shall be made from class 1 to class 2 in order of appointment to the force after three years' service as privates of class 1, and from class 2 to class 3 after five years' service as privates of class 2, in all cases where the conduct and intelligent attention to duty of any private shall justify such promotion.

"PAR. 3. The said Metropolitan police force shall consist of one major and superintendent, who shall continue to be invested with such powers and charged with such duties as is provided by existing law; and also of one assistant superintendent with the rank of inspector; three surgeons for the police and fire departments; three inspectors; ten captains; twelve lieutenants, one of whom shall be harbor master; and such number of sergeants, and privates of class 3, privates of class 2, privates of class 1, mounted inspectors, captains, lieutenants, sergeants, and privates on horses and bicycles, and such others as said Commissioners may deem necessary within the appropriations made by Congress: Provided, That the inspectors shall perform the duties at present required of captains in the force, that the captains shall command police precincts and perform such duty or duties in connection therewith as the laws and regulations of the said Commissioners may prescribe: And provided further, That the said Metropolitan police force shall continue as at present constituted until the offices created hereby are filled and promotions are made by said Commissioners as provided in this act.

"PAR. 4. Said Commissioners, in addition to the powers vested in them by law, are also hereby authorized and empowered to make, modify, and enforce, under such penalties as they may deem necessary, all needful rules and regulations for the proper government, conduct, discipline, and good name of said Metropolitan police force; and said Commissioners are hereby authorized and empowered to fine, suspend with or without pay, and dismiss any officer or member of the said police force for any offense against the laws of the United States or the laws and ordinances or regulations of the District of Columbia, whether before or after conviction thereof in any court or courts, and for misfeasance in office, or for any breaches or violation of the rules and regulations made by said Commissioners for the government, conduct, discipline and good name of said police force: Provided, That no person shall be removed from said police force except upon written charges preferred against him in the name of the major and superintendent of said police force to the trial board or boards hereinafter provided for and after an opportunity shall have been afforded him of being heard in his defense; but no person so removed shall be reappointed to any office in said police force: Provided further, That special policemen and additional privates may be removed from office by said Commissioners, or a majority of them, without cause and without trial: Provided further, That charges preferred against any member of said police force to the trial board or boards hereinafter provided for may be altered or amended, in the discretion of such trial board or boards, at any time before final action by such board or boards, under such regulations as the Commissioners may adopt, provided the accused have an opportunity to be heard thereon.

SEC. 5. The said Commissioners are also hereby authorized and empowered to create one or more trial board or boards, to be composed of such number of persons as said Commissioners may appoint thereto, for the trial of officers and members of said police force; and said Commissioners are hereby also authorized and empowered to make and amend rules of procedure before such trial board or boards and to change or abolish any such trial board or boards as they may deem proper; and the findings of such trial board or boards shall be final and conclusive unless appeal in writing therefrom is made within five days to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the hearings on appeal to be submitted either orally or in writing, and the decision of the said Commissioners thereon shall be final and conclusive: Provided, That said Commissioners shall not be required, in their review of the sentences and findings of such trial board or boards, to take evidence, either oral, written, or documentary, and they shall have power to reduce or modify the findings and penalty of the trial board or boards or remand any case against any officer or member of said police force to such board or boards for such further proceedings as they may deem necessary: Provided, That the chairman for the time being of any and every trial board be, and he is hereby, authorized to administer oaths to and take affirmations of witnesses before such board or boards: Provided further, That all proceedings now pending before any trial board authorized by said Commissioners shall be continued according to the practice heretofore existing until final determination thereof: And provided further, That the rules and regulations of said Metropolitan police force heretofore promulgated and in force are hereby ratified and shall remain in force until changed, altered, amended, or abolished by said Commissioners.

SEC. 6. The members of the said police force now designated as desk sergeants shall cease to be known as such and shall become privates of class 1 from and after the date this act is to take effect.

SEC. 7. Police surgeons shall have actually and bona fide resided in the District of Columbia for at least two years next preceding the date of their appointment and shall be duly qualified according to law for the practice of medicine and surgery in said District and shall have actively been engaged in the practice of their profession for a period of at least three years next preceding the date of their appointment. Police surgeons shall be members of the said police force and shall be subject to the laws, rules, and regulations for the government, good conduct, discipline, and removal of other officers or members of the said police force. Such police surgeons shall devote their entire time and attention to said police force, attend, without charge, all members of said police force and of the fire department of said District, examine applicants for appointment and retirement in and to said police force and said fire department, and attend such dependent sick and injured, and examine and attend such insane or alleged insane persons as may be taken in charge by said police, and shall perform such other duties as the said Commissioners may direct.

SEC. 8. The salaries of the officers and members of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia herein provided shall commence with the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1907, and shall continue thereafter annually, unless changed by Congress, as follows: The major and superintendent shall receive an annual salary of $4,000; the assistant superintendent shall receive an annual salary of $2,500; inspectors shall each receive an annual salary of $1,800; police surgeons shall each receive an annual salary of $1,800; captains shall each receive an annual salary of $1,500; lieutenants shall each receive an annual salary of $1,320; sergeants shall each receive an annual salary of $1,250; privates of class 3 shall each receive an annual salary of $1,200; privates of class 2 shall each receive an annual salary of $1,080; privates of class 1 shall each receive an annual salary of $900; members of said police force who may be mounted on horses shall each receive an extra compensation of $240 per annum, and members of said force who may be mounted on bicycles shall each receive an extra compensation of $50 per annum.

SEC. 9. No officer or member of the said police force, under penalty of forfeiting the salary or pay which may be due him, shall withdraw or resign, except by permission of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, unless he shall have given the major and superintendent one month's notice in writing of such intention.

SEC. 10. Nothing contained in this act shall be held to repeal sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 of the act hereby amended, or the act of Congress approved May 11, 1892, entitled 'An act to punish false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police force and fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes,' and the act amendatory thereof, approved February 20, 1896, or any other law in force at the time this act is to take effect, except in so far as the same may be inconsistent with or replaced by some provision hereof.

SEC. 11. This act shall take effect and be in force on, from, and after July 1, 1906."

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that a bill of so much importance as that ought to be explained.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise also to know something about the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not think you can revolutionize and reorganize the entire police force of this District of Columbia by that sort of a performance without some explanation from the gentleman as to the nature of the bill. I would like to know what the bill is about.

Mr. SULZER. The bill has just been read.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman from New York know what is it?

Mr. SULZER. I do. It is to reorganize the police force of the District of Columbia. It is a most commendable bill, and it should pass without opposition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What changes are made?

Mr. SULZER. No very material changes from existing law. It simply graduates the salaries of the policemen and fixes their status in the department—a very good thing, in my opinion. It is in line with efficient reform that I believe in and most sincerely favor. I want to see this bill pass, and I hope it will.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] such time as he desires.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the proposed legislation is to reorganize the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia. The bill has three purposes: First, the general reorganization of the force and giving legislative force to the rules and regulations that have heretofore been found to be practical and effective covering the police force in this District. The second purpose of the bill is to provide an increase in the salaries and to reclassify the members of the force. The third purpose of the bill is to change the manner in which trials of members of the police force shall be conducted. Now, in the preparation of the bill the committee has taken into account the experience of the Commissioners of the District—has, in fact, taken their rules and regulations and embodied in the bill such of these regulations as have been found to be practical in the control and operation of the force.

Among the things that have been changed is the manner in which policemen shall be tried. Heretofore when a policeman has been charged with a violation of the rules touching his duty or violation of the laws of the District or the Government he has been tried before a board of inquiry. This board sent its investigation to the District Commissioners, and the whole question was gone over by the District Commissioners, and they made their findings. We have provided in this bill that in a trial of that character the trial board shall make a finding that shall be conclusive unless appealed from by the aggrieved party. This relieves the Commissioners of a great amount of work that has heretofore gone to them from these trial boards or boards of inquiry.

In the reclassification of the force and the increase of salaries we find something like 600 members in the police force of the District. Three hundred and seventy of these are now in class 1, and receive a salary of $900 a year. Two hundred and sixty-five are in class 2, and receive a salary of $1,080 a year. We have proposed in this bill an additional class—class 3—in which we propose to make the salary $1,200 a year. Under the reclassification and the provision made for promotion there would go into the new class 3, at $1,200 a year, the 265 men who are now in class 2, now receiving $1,080 a year, and 123 out of class 1, who are receiving now $900 a year. There would go out of class 1 into class 2, 149. The proposition is to have men serve three years in class 1 from the time of their entrance upon the service. After they have served three years in class 1 they are to be advanced to class 2. After having served two additional years in class 2, then they may be advanced to class 3, provided always that the promotion is made when attention to duty and the general deportment of the officer is such as to commend him for such promotion and increase.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A question. The promotion, then, comes regularly, according to the length of service, unless the officer has been so derelict in the performance of his duty as not to be entitled to it?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The promotion is automatic. When he has served three years in class 1 he is then promoted to class 2.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, who determines the question of the fitness or unfitness for promotion?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is determined by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in consultation with the major of police.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is no room in this bill, is there, for the exercise of favoritism or of pulls in the way of promotion?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We think not.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There can be no promotions until those in class 1 have served three years in that class?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. None.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And those in class 2 have served two additional years?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And no promotion out of class 2 to class 3 until he shall have served five years.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. How much leave of absence is allowed to a policeman here in the city?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Twenty days out of the year.

Mr. TAWNEY. With pay?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. With pay; yes.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. What other significance is attached to these different classifications aside from the length of service?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I did not catch the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. What significance is attached to these different classifications aside from the length of service—anything?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. None whatever, except attention to duty and length of service. The promotion is made upon the length of service and faithful attention to duty.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman this question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman from Minnesota inquired about the annual leave to which a policeman is entitled. Are they required to perform duty on holidays and Sundays?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They are; and I will say, in that connection, that these men serve on an average of four hundred and seventy-four days in the year, giving eight hours a day. That is to say, they are on duty from fourteen to sixteen hours every day.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman what the rule has been heretofore in reference to these promotions?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The same rule as is proposed in this bill. After a man served three years in class 1 he was promoted to class 2.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What is the necessity for the legislation, then, if that has been the rule?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That was merely a regulation; and in the reorganization, and making the provision for class 3, we simply enacted into law the provision that had heretofore existed, as a rule, the Commissioners thinking that was the better policy.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that each time you grade them up after the first three years their salaries are increased?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Their salaries are increased with every promotion.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then at the end of three years all the men in the service will have a higher grade?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And at the end of six years will probably have a change to the highest grade and salary in the service?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. At the end of five years—as a private.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is not the effect of this bill to greatly increase the sum that will be paid to the force?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The total increase provided for in this bill is $112,250 in round numbers.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has the gentleman taken the pains to examine the statistics of other cities and ascertain whether or not this city is paying a larger amount to its police force than other cities?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We have made considerable investigation in that direction, and we have found that upon the whole this city pays less to its police force, less to its officers, and that its police force does a greater amount of work than the police in any similar city in the United States. For instance, in the District of Columbia there are 70 square miles to police. Outside of the city of Washington there are sixty-eight municipalities, embracing a population of 65,000. The Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia police these 70 square miles and police these sixty-eight municipalities, and do all the work of that character within this radius. In Detroit, with a radius of 29 miles, and in Cincinnati, with a radius of 40 miles, and San Francisco, with a like radius, the average pay of officers and men is greater than is proposed by this bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman base his estimate on the number of policemen in the force, or upon the amount of square miles, or the number of inhabitants of the city?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We base it on both. For instance, the population of Washington is somewhat similar to that of Detroit and Cincinnati. We pay less on an average here than is paid there.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If this bill becomes law, will the pay be larger than is paid in the usual city of the United States?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It will still be a little below the average.

Mr. HOAR. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether they have considered the question of the advisability of providing for an examination, a second examination, of a policeman before the appointment is made transferring him from one division to another?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will answer the gentleman from Massachusetts that a very rigid examination is made of every applicant for membership of the Metropolitan police force before he enters. After that there is no physical examination.

Mr. HOAR. Now, I have had considerable experience with the police force for a number of years, and the great trouble in my experience is that you have a high standard of efficiency when a man is admitted to the service, but you have no provision for maintaining that standard of efficiency by an examination after he shall have once entered. Now, that is the trouble peculiarly with a permanent police force. Now do you not now have an excellent opportunity, when you are providing for the advancement of a grade, to have a subsequent examination, as they do in the Navy, and in many of the official departments of the Government, so that you can maintain the standard of efficiency in the police force with which you started when the man was first admitted?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The committee took that matter into consideration, and I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that this is one of several bills we had before us, one especially providing for an examination prior to promotion, but it was thought by the Commissioners, and by those who appeared before the committee, that it was unfair to a man after he had served, say, for five years, and had his health impaired by reason of his service to eliminate him from the service and dismiss him because of the deterioration of his health, which was an incident of his service. I will say this: The policemen have created and are maintaining a pension fund. That fund is available to all members of the Metropolitan force regularly admitted into the service. After a man has paid into that fund for a period of three years, or for a period of five years, the committee thought it was unjust and unfair to him to say that he should not be permitted to serve out his allotted time of fifteen years or more before he could retire upon a pension.

Mr. HOAR. What happens with the police force practically, according to my experience and observation, is that after a little while you have a certain per cent of the men who have to be assigned to the easy jobs of the police force and you have the rest of the men who are exposed to peculiar hardships and unusual demands contrasted with the men who have the easy jobs, all getting the same pay, and the men who have to undergo the unusual demands and the peculiar hardships receiving no special compensating advantage. Now, what you need with the policemen, as you do with the firemen and all men engaged in extra hazardous business, is to maintain them at the highest standard of efficiency during their service; and with my experience with different police forces that I have had to deal with, I have thought that the way to do it was to have, just as you do in the Navy, the requirement that a man shall not have his advance unless he can pass his examination for physical efficiency as well as for intelligence.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The testimony at the hearing that the committee held was to the effect that men serve out their time with efficiency. They must pass a rigid examination prior to their entrance upon the service; and it did not occur to us——

Mr. SULZER. They have to pass an examination before they are promoted, do they not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There is no physical examination prior to promotion. We thought it was unfair to a man who had served, say, for five years——

Mr. SULZER. I mean there is an examination as to their capacity, efficiency, and so forth, before an officer is promoted?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There is a rating kept of every policeman.

Mr. SULZER. That is the point I desire to make, and to have you explain that to the Members of the House who do not understand it, in my opinion.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Every policeman has a rating.

and that rating is taken into account when his turn comes automatically for promotion; and if his rating is such as not to justify his promotion, he is not promoted; but the physical examination, having been rigid in the first instance, is not again required.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the gentleman if there is an age limit when they retire from the force?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Only this—they may not enter after they are 35 years of age. They may retire after fifteen years of service if disqualified physically.

Mr. STERLING. Do they have a salary after they retire?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They retire on a pension.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. How much?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Fifty dollars a month is the maximum.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. I see that the sum of $240 per annum is allowed to each member of the mounted police. I would like to ask if that is the existing law?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the existing law. They have to buy their own horses and feed them, and the testimony before the committee was that the price of suitable horses was now all the way from $250 to $350 each, and that the price of feed runs very high.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Do the provisions of this bill make any increase in existing law?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. None whatever in additional pay given to mounted policemen, either upon horseback or on bicycles.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Is this $240 per annum considered a part of the policeman's pay or simply to compensate him for the value of his horse and its keep?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is an additional compensation for what he is deemed to be out for buying and maintaining his horse.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman think $240 a year for the use of one horse is pretty expensive?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We thought not. In fact the testimony is to the effect that the men would rather serve on foot without this $240 than to serve on horseback with it.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I notice you have an additional sum of $50 as compensation for a policeman who is on a bicycle.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Is that to compensate him for the wear and tear of the bicycle?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is to provide him with bicycles, and to keep his bicycle in repair; and if the gentleman from Minnesota has ever kept up a bicycle, he will undoubtedly agree, as the committee did, that it was not too much. That is existing law.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Fifty dollars buys a very fair bicycle.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes, but a policeman using a bicycle four hundred and seventy-four days in a year causes much wear and tear on the bicycle.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Does he wear one out every year?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That question was not before us. Being existing law we allowed it to stand.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption as to the allowence for use of bicycles.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the postal service only the sum of $15 to $20 per annum to letter carriers who have need of bicycles is allowed, and I must say that they have use of the bicycles as much as have the Metropolitan police. I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota, that $50 a year is an exorbitant amount.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will say, in answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin, that I understand the Government furnishes the bicycles, buys them for the carrier and furnishes $15 or $20 a year for keeping the bicycles in repair. In this instance the policeman must buy his bicycle and keep it in repair.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg to challenge the statement of the gentleman from Kansas. The Post-Office Department does not purchase the bicycles for the carriers, but allots to each carrier a certain sum per annum, $15 to $20, for the purchase and care of the wheel.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is my understanding.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I had a different understanding of that, and if I am wrong am glad to be corrected.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Fifty dollars per annum is a high price for this object. The life of a bicycle, in my experience, is four or five years.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is not there more strain on a bicycle ridden by an ordinary policeman weighing 240 to 350 pounds, than there is when ridden by an ordinary letter carrier?

Mr. DRISCOLL. But not so much speed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman take into consideration the weight of mail the letter carrier may carry?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will say in addition to what I have said that these policemen are required and do provide their own bicycles and a cyclometer for registering speed and distance.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. What is the expense of that? I am informed they only cost a dollar.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. There was so much confusion on the floor that some gentlemen did not understand the amount appropriated for bicycle policemen. What is the amount proposed?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Fifty dollars a year, the existing law. We have made no change in that.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the aggregate increase in the compensation of policemen in this city under this proposed change of law?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. One hundred and twelve thousand two hundred and fifty dollars a year.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the amount of the increase?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the amount of the increased expenditure.

Mr. TAWNEY. Over and above the current appropriation?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Over and above the current appropriation; yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. What amount do these policemen receive when they are retired?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. From $20 to $50 a month; $50 is the maximum.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is that on a basis of the percentage of the salary received while in the service?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is paid out of the police pension fund. It is made up of a dollar a month out of the salary of each policeman, and out of rewards that policemen, from time to time, secure for making arrests, and out of fines that are paid by the policemen when they are tried for dereliction of duty.

Mr. TAWNEY. A part of it, however, is made up from deductions from their salaries.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. One dollar a month is taken out of the salary of each policeman, $12 a year.

Mr. TAWNEY. And that is now made the basis for the increase of their salaries?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no. It is included in the items of their expenses, but is a very small part of it.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. RYAN. The gentleman talks about superannuation of patrolmen. I would like to ask him if they are superannuated after fifteen years of service, and to state whether or not that is arbitrary on the part of the Commissioners or is it to take place upon disability.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They may be retired at that time if upon examination they are found incapacitated to perform their duty.

Mr. RYAN. The gentleman says they may be retired at that time, but not necessarily.

Suppose a man joins the department at the age of 25, after fifteen years of service he is 40 years old. Then he may be superannuated and placed on a salary of $50 a month?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; he may not retire at any time voluntarily.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman means to say he can not retire before he is 50 years of age?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; he may be retired then if found incapacitated for duty.

Mr. LITTAUER. But if he is not disabled?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If he is not disabled he could serve until he was incompetent to perform his duties.

Mr. LITTAUER. And if he did not get in at 25 he could not retire at 50.

Mr. RYAN. Then, a man entering the police department of the District at 25 if he was in good health at 40 could retire and receive $50 a month under that regulation?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The officer does not retire until he is unfit for duty.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is he obliged to retire at 50 years of age?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no; not if he is able to work. There are some over 50; there are some 60 years of age now on the police force.

Mr. MADDEN. Before I ask my question I want to read part of the bill. The bill provides there shall be one superintendent, one assistant superintendent; there shall be three surgeons, three inspectors, ten captains, twelve lieutenants, one of whom shall be harbormaster, and such number of sergeants and privates of class 3, privates of class 2, privates of class 1, etc., as said Commissioners may deem necessary within the appropriations made by Congress. Now, I would like to know what we need with an assistant superintendent for a police department containing 625 members?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. You have an assistant superintendent at Chicago, at $4,000 a year.

Mr. MADDEN. I did not ask what we paid them, but why we need one.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We need one here for the same reason you need one in Chicago; the superintendent can not be on duty twenty-four hours in the day.

Mr. MADDEN. He has his captains. Why do they need three inspectors for 625 men, and what do you propose to pay them?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We propose to pay them $1,800 a year.

Mr. MADDEN. What work will they be called upon to do?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, the general work that devolves upon inspectors in a police force.

Mr. MADDEN. Why do you increase the number of captains by seven?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. To have a captain for each of the ten precincts. We increase them by six instead of seven.

Mr. MADDEN. Why do you provide surgeons for the department?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Because it is necessary to have surgeons to attend the policemen and members of the fire department and to attend the insane who come within the jurisdiction of the policemen.

Mr. MADDEN. Do you know of any other city in the Union where they have surgeons for the police department?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; they have them in Cleveland and——

Mr. MADDEN. We do not have them in Chicago.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; but Chicago is not the only city in the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true.

Mr. HOAR. Do they not have police ambulances in almost all the cities——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I presume they do, even in the city of Chicago.

Mr. HOAR. And have medical officers to go with them?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And you have no medical officer in Chicago?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, you ought to have.

Mr. MADDEN. You are creating an assistant superintendent, three inspectors, six additional captains, three surgeons, and an additional number of commanding officers in the bill, which seems to be unnecessary for the number of men in the rank and file. The bill then provides an unlimited number of men in the rank of the department, does it not?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no.

Mr. MADDEN. What does it provide?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It does not provide for a single increase.

Mr. MADDEN. It says there shall be just as many men in the department as the Commissioners may see fit to appoint in accordance with the appropriations made by Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Ah, that is it exactly—there shall be no increase in the number except by the consent of the Committee on Appropriations. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the superintendent of police may not increase the number without the action of Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman think that the number of commanding officers is entirely out of proportion with the number of men in the ranks?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We do not think so. We have here, I will say, in answer to the gentleman, one of the highest class cities in the United States, and there devolves upon the police force, from year to year, very important duties. The policemen in the city of Washington—the officers and the superintendent—have often to deal with nice international questions. We have here a metropolitan city—a city that is made up of people from the whole country, indeed, from the whole world. There are foreign ministers and ambassadors here who have children. All of these relations and conditions make the work of the police force a very important and a very different work from the work of a policeman in a city where such conditions do not exist.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will not attempt to say that we have not people from every other country in every other city in the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But you do not have them in the same relations in which we have them here. I doubt if the son of a diplomat has ever been found violating the swimming laws in the lake near Chicago, whose arrest by a policeman would raise an international question.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there anything so sacred about the person of the son of a diplomat that a policeman, when this man is found violating the laws, would not have the right to arrest him?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, it would raise an international question at once if it should be done.

Mr. MADDEN. And would the policemen either in the city of Washington or any other city be expected to be able to know whether he was the son of a diplomat or not?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the thing he must know. That is the thing he must be careful about.

Mr. SMYSER. Do they settle these questions in the police court?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No.

Mr. MADDEN. Is a policeman in Washington required to ask everybody who violates the law whether he is connected with some diplomatic corps before arresting him?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. He is supposed to know when and where and how to act.

Mr. MADDEN. They are required to do that everywhere.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, there are some of us who would like to have some more information about this pension system. If a man should enter the police service at 25 years of age and voluntarily retire at 40 and be entitled to $50 a month, that is an aspect of this legislation that does not strike me as equitable. What is the pension system? How is that branch of the law administered? What is the basis of granting pensions?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The basis of a pension is total disability, and the pension is paid out of a fund that has been created by the policemen themselves.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is that fund always adequate to meet the requirements of the pension law?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And there never has yet been an appropriation needed to replenish the fund?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There has never been a request made upon Congress for any contribution to the pension fund of the Metropolitan policemen, and we are simply continuing in this bill the existing law on the tenure of the service and the pension to be paid to the policemen.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand the pension system is for this, that if a man in the service is disabled before he has performed fifteen years' of service he is granted a pension.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If he is totally disabled.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And that is graded according to the disability.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; if he is totally disabled——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If he is totally disabled during the fifteen years' time he is granted a pension of $50 a month.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is the maximum?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If he serves for the full fifteen years and retires voluntarily, he is entitled to a pension of $50 a month, whether he is disabled or not?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If he voluntarily retires after fifteen years' of service he may be pensioned at anywhere from $20 to $50 a month, depending on his disability.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman says he may be pensioned anywhere from $20 to $50 if he voluntarily retires. The question is, Has he the right under the law to a pension after fifteen years' of service upon voluntary retirement?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Has he the right to any particular rate of pension?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; that rate is fixed by the Commissioners and the three examining surgeons to which reference has been made.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is a new phase of this question. What is the minimum rate of pension upon voluntary retirement after fifteen years of service?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Twenty dollars a month.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If he is disabled his pension is rated in accordance with his disability?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Not above $50 a month?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; so far there has only been one instance where the pensioner has been allowed the maximum of $50 a month.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I notice in the report this statement:

An examination of the salaries paid to the privates of the police force in cities other than Washington show municipalities of the population of the District of Columbia, and much less in area, treat their police officers more generously than is the case here.

And then they cite Pittsburg, Philadelphia, Boston, and Chicago, four of the largest cities of the United States, and larger than the District of Columbia by many times, each one of them. Using those I do not understand why the committee did not find time to look a little to the city of Baltimore, and find out what they were paying there. It is a city about the same size as the city of Washington. I do not find in the report any allusion to Baltimore or cities the size of Washington, unless in one instance reference is made to the city of Cincinnati.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will say to the gentleman from New York that a further reading of the report will disclose the fact—probably not in the report, but in the hearings—we may have been unjust to ourselves in not setting it out in the report, but we considered in reference to the salaries those paid in Detroit and Milwaukee—I think, even, in Baltimore and Cincinnati.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand a Representative from Baltimore to say that the privates there are paid at the rate of $15 to $18 a week. They have a weekly salary there, and at $18 it would amount to $936. It is fair to say that a bill is now pending before the legislature to increase it to $20 a week, which will be $1,040; that is the highest salary paid to privates in the city of Baltimore. The sergeants there, I find, get $21 a week—$1,092 a year—and under the proposed act they will receive $23, which makes $1,192. That is about equal to those in this bill. Instead of the committee taking a city substantially the same size as Washington, they have taken their criterion from Chicago, Philadelphia, and Pittsburg.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will ask the gentleman from New York if he really thinks that the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia and city of Washington should be put upon the same status as the police of Baltimore?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I do not know of any reason why they should not. I do not know why they should have any more difficult duties to perform.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In the first place, a visit to Baltimore will disclose the fact that the policemen there are not as well dressed as they are here. It is not required of them that they shall be.

Mr. WACHTER. In that I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. PAYNE. I was just going to suggest that I did not know about that. If the gentleman will look at the statistics he will find that, I think, a very large percentage of the police force of the city of Washington are residents really of the city of Baltimore. If that is not the case, the Members from Maryland have failed to get in their work on this account in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I admit that the gentleman from Maryland has been very industrious and succeeded in enlarging the population of Washington and diminishing the population of Baltimore by putting his friends on the police force here in other years, but the fact is that it costs a great deal more to live here than it does in Baltimore.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know why.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not know, either, but I know that it is the truth, nevertheless. The great cost of living is one of the arguments in support of increased pay under this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. The cost of living is one of the arguments in this report. Still the committee seems to believe that while a policeman can live on $900 a year for three years, after that he ought to have a little more. I do not think the cost of living is a fair argument in that connection. It will cost as much for a man to live when he is getting $900 as it will the man who is getting $1,200.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In many instances men entering the service are young men without families. As they remain in the service and get settled down they get married and have families to support. A large percentage of the members of the force who are in the regular service have families to support, but many young men enter the service and have no families.

Mr. PAYNE. I would have been better pleased with the bill if the committee had only one promotion and then had retained the salaries as already in force in the District instead of increasing the pay to about $1,200 a year for privates.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The committee took into account the question of raising the salaries and the question as to when they should be raised, and after a full hearing the committee unanimously decided that they should be raised, and that they should not only be raised, but that the increased salaries should begin on the 1st of July, 1906. The testimony showed that the average policeman pays house rent amounting to $22.50 a month; that his grocery bill for a family averaging four amounts to $35 a month; that his fuel amounts to $7.50 a month; his gas amounts to $3; his washing to $1.50; the average cost of uniform per month, $5.71, and his payment to the pension fund, $1 a month. I will say nothing about the pension fund.

Mr. MADDEN. How did you get that information?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. From members of the police force.

Mr. WACHTER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WACHTER. How many uniforms do they buy a year?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The average cost per month of uniform to a member of the force is $5.71; and I should say that he would not have very much over enough to buy one overcoat and one uniform.

Mr. WACHTER. And they are required to dress very well, and, as a matter of fact, have a better appearance than any other police force in the country.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They are required always to be in a presentable condition, and I submit the fact that they are a well-dressed, gentlemanly, well-appearing police force. And I cheerfully say of them, that they are far above the average in character. Last year out of a force of over 600 there were only 12 cases of intoxication in the whole year.

Mr. WACHTER. When they want to become intoxicated they go to Baltimore, and when they go there and do that, they are arrested and locked up the same as anybody else.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That shows at least that they have a regard for the city of Washington and for their duties here.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. I understand that after five years a policeman receives $1,200 a year.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. Is there a single other city in the United States where privates after five years' service receive as high salaries as that?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will answer that San Francisco pays $162 a month.

Mr. KAHN. From the day that they are appointed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. From the day that they are appointed. And what I said a moment ago applies always to the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia. They are required to police a larger area per man, and they are required to perform a more distinctive service than the members of any other police force.

There are more insane people who come to Washington, and who must be cared for and managed by the police force, than in any other city of similar size in the whole country; and in making that statement I intend no reflection whatever upon Members of this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEEKS. I want to suggest that the reason for the high salaries of San Francisco policemen is because the service there is extra hazardous.

Mr. KAHN. Not any more so than in the city of Boston.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. New York pays $1,200. The maximum paid in the city of Boston is $1,200, is it not?

Mr. WEEKS. The maximum is $1,200.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, that is the maximum that we propose here.

Mr. WEEKS. But in Boston only a small proportion of the men receive $1,200.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Only a small proportion will receive it here.

Mr. WEEKS. Practically every man—every man after five years of service.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. After five years' service; yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Can the gentleman from Kansas state how many receive that?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I can tell you exactly. There will be 265 out of class 2 and 123 out of class 1 who will go into class 3.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to ask the gentleman one more question while I am on my feet.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. I notice in the report on page 5 it is stated that many of the men have become discouraged on account of receiving only $900 a year after their long service. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is a single instance of a resignation from the Washington police force in the past year, and how many men there are waiting to fill vacancies on the force?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There have been resignations not only within the last year, but within the last month, and the Commissioners are having difficulty in keeping up the standard of the men because of the small pay that they receive. The men have become discouraged because they can not make ends meet on the salaries that they receive. The salaries of the policemen in this District have not been increased since 1880, and there has been a considerable increase in living expenses within that time.

Mr. PALMER. If you do not include Members of Congress among the insane persons who come here, how do you account for the surplus of lunatics in Washington? [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I want, of course, to be generous to the membership of this body. That is the reason I have not included them among the people who come to Washington with wheels in their heads.

Mr. SULZER. Perhaps it is because there are so many who want to be Members of Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; that might be true. But it is true that people come here who have to be taken into custody by the police force, men and women having a presentable appearance, men and women who want to see the President; men and women, if you please, who want to see Members of Congress; men and women who want to run the Government, who have some panacea for all the ills that flesh is heir to.

Last year there were over 400 cases of this kind to deal with by the Washington police surgeons.

Mr. DRISCOLL. How many policemen are there of all kinds in the capital—Metropolitan police, Capitol police, and White House police?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The White House police are Metropolitan policemen. We take no account of the Capitol police. They take exclusive charge of the Capitol grounds. In addition to the Capitol police, there are thirty-nine policemen, appointed by the War Department, who have charge of all the parks in the park system of the city.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understood the gentleman from Kansas to say a moment ago that he could, after fifteen years of service, retire as a matter of right.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. My information is that an officer can not retire without an examination, showing that he is unfitted for the service.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then is it a voluntary retirement or a compulsory retirement?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They are never retired until they are physically unfitted for the service. There are many men on the force now who are 60 years of age.

Mr. RYAN. Then why do you have this provision as to the fifteen years' limit in it? It means nothing.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why do you put it in?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This bill, as a matter of fact, reenacts the old law or continues the old law. We make no changes whatever in the law as it now stands with respect to that matter, either in the pensions or the retirement of the man from the service.

Mr. TAWNEY. It has some bearing, if the gentleman will pardon me, on the question of whether the salaries should be increased or not for the purpose of determining the benefits afforded them in consequence of the service, or because of the disabilities contracted while in the service. I notice another thing in the report; the gentleman includes the amount deducted for the pension fund from the salary as one of the reasons why the salary should be increased.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. If that is to be considered in determining whether or not the salaries should be increased in consequence of the retirement of the Government employees, on the amount deducted from their salary in the past, then we are up against the question of the Government maintaining a civil pension retirement fund.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no. The fact is, the $1 a month is a small part of the pension fund out of which these pensions are paid.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire whether any money is appropriated by the Government for this pension fund?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not a single cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the fines that are contributed to it would otherwise go into the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; and the rewards and matters of that kind.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman says that the item of $1 a month is inconsequential and therefore is not a matter of any serious consideration; but suppose we were to deduct from the salaries of the Government clerks $3 a month or $4 a month as some of the bills now pending before the House contemplate, then would it not be a still greater reason for their coming to Congress and asking that their salaries be increased to that extent in order to make up the difference between what they are actually paid and what their salaries should be?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In that instance you would be creating a pension fund wholly out of the salaries of the clerks, but in this case the pension fund is largely created out of other sources.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand that the item is small, but however that may be, if it is to be made a basis to increase the salaries in this instance, it would also be ground for demanding an increase of salary when the whole fund is made up out of deductions from salaries. I wanted to illustrate to the House the effect of the several retirement bills now pending before the committees of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kansas may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this bill does not provide for automatic promotions at the expiration of the three and five year periods. Will the gentleman from Kansas explain that provision?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, it provides for an automatic promotion after a service of three years in class 1 into class 2, for an automatic promotion out of class 2 into class 3 after an additional service of two years in class 2, and where the record of the officer in each case justifies promotion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This bill does not provide that if a man serves three years he shall receive an increase of salary. It provides that he shall be promoted provided that somebody approves of his conduct in the service during the three years. I wish to say to the gentleman in charge of this bill that that is one of the most objectionable features in the bill. All systems for the increase of pay and promotion of which I have any knowledge in police departments are dependent upon the length of service, dependent alone upon the fact that the man has served the requisite time. If the provision recommended here be adopted, if some private has served three years intelligently, faithfully and effectively, but has in the meantime incurred the displeasure of some superior officer, then that private will never be able to get out of the class to which he has been appointed. My opinion is this, that after a man has served three years if he is not entitled to promotion he ought to be dropped from the force. If he is entitled to promotion he should have his increase, if he is going to get one, without the consent of any superior officer.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The committee was of the opinion that it was not unfair to the officers who are to get this increase that their rating should be of the high character and high standard that was required, and the policemen themselves advocated this. The members of the police force who were before the committee heartily concurred in this method of promotion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The members of the police force may have done that, but I understand something about the way members of police forces agree to some provisions in order to get other provisions. I am somewhat familiar with the way police forces are controlled and regulated in large cities, and I would say to the gentleman that this would put in the hands of some official a power that should not be lodged in the hands of any official. It is more liable to abuse than any other possible provision that could be recommended.

Take a policeman who insists on enforcing the law in his district, on his beat, in a manner in strict accordance with the regulations, and some superior officer prefers that the law should not be strictly enforced in that particular district. This man in the conscientious performance of his duty will incur the displeasure of that superior officer, and that displeasure will make it impossible for him to get out of the class to which he was originally appointed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will say that no instance of the kind was called to our attention.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Human nature is no different in this district, so far as the police force is concerned, than it is in any of the great cities throughout the United States.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will again state to the gentleman from New York that no such instance was called to the attention of the committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I know that no policeman, if he suffered that injustice, who wished to continue in the force, would dare call any such instance to the attention of the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We gave everybody an opportunity to be heard. The policemen themselves came in and were represented in the hearings. There was no disposition whatever to deny anybody a right to say what he wanted to say in those hearings.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I am not criticising the action of the committee or the liberality displayed in giving the hearings; but I am stating some of the things that I know to be facts in connection with the administration of police departments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I call for the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no other general debate, the bill will be read under the five-minute rule. The clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act of Congress approved February 28, 1901, entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"PARAGRAPH 1. The Metropolitan police district of the District of Columbia shall be coextensive with the District of Columbia, and shall be subdivided into such police districts and precincts as the Commissioners of said District may from time to time direct."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting this pension statute into the RECORD. The statute is clear enough and contains a very satisfactory adjustment of the pension question. It seems from this statute that a policeman who has incurred an injury or a disability in line of duty is entitled to a pension for that injury or disability provided it renders him unfit for further service, but if he has served for full fifteen years and is disabled from continuing longer in the service, then he is entitled to a pension. The first pension is given for an injury or disability incurred in the service during the fifteen-year period.

The other pension is given for disability from injuries coming to the policeman without regard to the question as to whether they were incurred while in line of duty, and they must be of such character as to totally disable him from the performance of his duty as a policeman, and he can only get the pension after he has been in the service for fifteen years. There is no voluntary retirement at the end of fifteen years. There is no retirement provided for anywhere, excepting on account of unfitness for the discharge of duty; and if that unfitness is the result of disabilities incurred in the line of duty in the fifteen-year period the policeman is entitled to a pension, and if it is not the result of disabilities incurred in the line of duty and the policeman has served full fifteen years he is entitled to a pension not exceeding a maximum of $50 a month. The pension fund comes from the payment of certain fines, dog tax, and this assessment of a dollar a month on the salaries of these policemen.

Mr. STERLING. Does this change the provisions of the statute?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This bill, I understand, does not change in any respect the provision of the statute; therefore, I think the pension proposition is a fair, just, and equitable one; and I desire, Mr. Chairman, to insert this section of the statute in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Indiana will be allowed to insert the matter referred to as part of his remarks. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The extract referred to is as follows:

Provided, That hereafter the Commissioners shall deduct $1 each month from the pay of each policeman, which sum so deducted shall be added to and form a part of the present police fund, to be invested in United States or District bonds by the Treasurer of the United States, and be held by him subject to the drafts of the Commissioners for expenditures made in pursuance of law, and such expenditures shall be accounted for as required by law for other expenditures of the District; and said police fund shall be used for the relief of any policeman who, by injury received or disease contracted in line of duty, or having served not less than fifteen years, shall become so permanently disabled as to be discharged from service therefor; and in case of his death from such injury or disease, leaving a widow or children under 16 years, for their relief: Provided further, That such relief shall not exceed for any one policeman or his family the sum of $50 per month; and a sum not exceeding $75 may be allowed from said fund to defray the funeral expenses of any policeman dying in the service of the District.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAR. 2. The Commissioners of said District shall appoint to office, assign to such duty or duties as they may prescribe, and promote all officers and members of said Metropolitan police force according to such rules and regulations as said Commissioners in their exclusive jurisdiction and judgment may from time to time make, alter, or amend: Provided, That original appointments of privates on said police force at the time this act takes effect shall be classified as follows: Class 1: Privates who have served under their present appointments less than three years shall be included in class 1, and at the expiration of three years from the date of said appointment shall be promoted to class 2, if the conduct and intelligent attention to duty of such privates shall justify such promotion. Class 2: Privates who have served under their present appointments more than three years and less than five years shall be included in class 2; and after the expiration of five years from the date of said appointment shall be promoted to class 3, if the conduct and intelligent attention to duty of such privates shall justify such promotion. Class 3: Privates who have served under their present appointment more than five years shall be included in class 3. All original appointments of privates shall be made to class 1, and promotions shall be made from class 1 to class 2 in order of appointment to the force after three years' service as privates of class 1, and from class 2 to class 3 after five years' service as privates of class 2, in all cases where the conduct and intelligent attention to duty of any private shall justify such promotion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to offer some amendments to paragraph 2.

The CHAIRMAN. Paragraph 2 has been passed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I was endeavoring to get the attention of the Chair, but the Clerk read it so quickly I could not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to strike out, on page 2, line 12, the words "if the conduct and intelligent attention to duty of such privates shall justify such promotion," and as that language appears three times in the paragraph, I make the motion so as to include the same language in lines 18 and 19 and in lines 2 and 3, on page 3. It is similar language applying to each class, and I can discuss it all at one time, and I imagine the action of the committee will be identical on the three clauses.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 12, 13, and 14, strike out the words "if the conduct and intelligent attention to duty of such privates shall justify such promotion."

In lines 18 and 19 strike out the same words.

Page 3, lines 2 and 3, strike out all after the word "two."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Chair will submit the three amendments together.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I hope these amendments will not be adopted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suppose I am entitled to recognition first. The gentleman can discuss it afterwards.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if the effect of striking out these words will make promotion automatic?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the effect of this amendment. This bill, primarily, is intended to provide for certain automatic increases in salaries of the police force. As a matter of fact, it does nothing of the kind. After a private has served three years he is entitled to promotion to the second class with an increase of salary, provided "the conduct and intelligent attention to duty of such private shall justify such promotion." This paragraph provides that appointments shall be made originally by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. At present the manner in which men are appointed to the police force is as follows: They file their application, they are examined by the Civil Service Commission at the request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, although it is not compulsory, and providing they attain a certain standard in their examinations and meet a standard of physical requirements they are appointed to the force.

Then a man will serve for three years at the salary fixed for class 1. In any system in which automatic promotions are recognized, at that time he should be entitled to an increase of salary and promotion to the next class. This bill makes it dependent, however, "upon his conduct and his intelligent attention to his duty." Now, this conduct and intelligent attention to duty is not something within the knowledge of the Commissioners of the District. It is entirely dependent upon the report made by the officials in the department. In the conduct and management of a police force many abuses necessarily exist, and they are not peculiar to any one police department. They are peculiar to every police department. It is claimed that the department here is peculiarly free from abuses that affect other police departments; and that may be true. But if some conscientious private is assigned to duty in some precinct where a number of violations of law are existing, or where certain practices exist, and, if he, in the discharge of his duty, attempts to prevent those abuses and practices, and if his superior officers desire that conditions continue to exist which are prohibited under the law, if the man does his duty he will find that at the end of three years the report upon his "conduct and intelligent attention to duty" is such that it will be impossible for him to obtain any promotion. It places these men on the force, unless they attain the highest salaries possible under the law, at the absolute mercy of their superior officers. Now, it is not necessary to speak about the police force of the District of Columbia. The Members of this House have some knowledge of the existing conditions generally in police forces; and this discretionary power fixed in somebody——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. To determine whether a man is entitled to this increased salary, makes it impossible for a private to be independent and to perform his work in the conscientious manner that he should. If, at the end of the three years, this man's conduct record has been such that he is not entitled to promotion, he should not continue a member of the force. A man should not be kept at the original salary, conducting himself in a manner that is improper, that does not conform to the ideal police standard, but he should be tried for his offenses and separated from the force if unfit.

Under the provisions of this bill a man can enter the police force in the lowest class, whatever it is, and remain there for fifteen years until he is entitled to retire. Now, if there should be an automatic increase of pay, dependent upon length of service, the privates should get that increase when the time has expired, or else they should be dropped from the service. In no other way, Mr. Chairman, will the force be effective, independent, and enabled to discharge its duty in a proper and conscientious manner. Speaking of this particular language in this bill, because I have some knowledge of the manner in which police forces are conducted, I know of abuses that can arise in the administration of the police department, and I know that no greater power, no power which will have a greater effect or place more tyrannical power in the head of a police force, can possibly be devised than that given in this little language—the promotions shall be made if "the conduct and attention to duty" shall entitle the privates to it.

The gentleman in charge of this bill states that the members of the force—privates—came before the committee and not a single complaint has been made of abuses under the present system, which I suppose is similar to this. Why, the gentleman must either be unfamiliar with the methods obtaining in police departments, or he has forgotten something about human nature. To imagine any private upon the police force to-day who would come to the committee and say that abuses have existed under such a law is to imagine an impossibility. I do not say they have existed here, but I do not think the gentleman from Kansas will say that it would be impossible for them ever to exist. I can only repeat now, Mr. Chairman, that if at the end of three years' service a private is not entitled by reason of his conduct to a promotion, then he should be dismissed from the force, because he is unfit to remain upon it. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I would say in reply I hope that the amendment will not be adopted. This is the way it would read if the amendment were adopted:

Provided, That after three years' service such an officer may be promoted whether his attention to duty has been intelligent and attentive or not, he shall be entitled, in any event after he has served three years, to be promoted and to have increased pay.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will ask the gentleman why if an officer has not been attentive to his duty during the first three years he ought not to be dropped?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There may be different degrees in the service. A man may be entitled to promotion, and again he may not be. Now, I call for a vote.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If during the three years a private is on the force he is guilty of infractions of the rules or discipline, provision is made in this bill for his punishment, is there not?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And if his offenses have been sufficiently grave, provision is made that he shall be dismissed?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, in addition to the punishments meted out to meet the particular offense for which he is tried, does the gentleman from Kansas also wish to inflict the additional penalty that he shall be held in this class at the discretion of somebody?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I would apply the same rules to him that are applied to everybody in every business throughout the whole country. Unless a man in any service, I do not care what it is, shows some fitness for the service and gives attention to his duty he is not promoted or advanced. He may do just enough to keep within the rules and regulations, to keep from violating the law, and to hold on.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If a man on the police force does not in three years demonstrate his capacity for the service, he should be eliminated, because he is a hindrance and detriment to it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There are degrees of efficiency even among policemen, and we must have some that are very capable and to put up with others who are not so capable.

I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 32.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 14, after the word "promotion," insert: "And provided further, That said officer shall have passed anew the examination required for admission to said force."

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the committee for a moment, it seems entirely fair that if an officer shall have served only three years on the police force he ought to maintain the same physical standard and the same standard of capacity and intelligence which was required in order to enable him to be admitted to the force. This amendment will prevent retrogression in the physical and intellectual standard required of a police officer, and it will tend to maintain the force in a better condition than if you allow him, without any examination at all, after he has been admitted to the police force, to advance along from one grade to another.

Anybody who has been familiar with the administration of the police force in any city knows that before the candidate passes his entrance examination he puts himself in perfect physical condition; but when he has once entered the force he then has no incentive to make him maintain the efficiency with which he started. The result is that at the end of five years your policeman has dropped down below the physical and mental standard that he should maintain; and I think, in order to maintain this standard of efficiency in the permanent force with which you start, you ought to provide that promotions be accompanied by a new examination.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts will not be adopted. That question was fully thrashed out in the hearings before the committee; and a second examination, after a man has undergone a thorough physical examination prior to entering the force, was thought to be unjust and unfair to the officer. I solicit the earnest support of my friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] against this amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that my support does not seem to be of very great weight, and I suggest that he appeal to somebody else. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Bring in your leaven and we will appreciate it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 14, after the word "promotion," insert the words "And provided further, That said officer shall have passed a new examination required for admission to said force."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOAR) there were—ayes 14, noes 32.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAR. 3. The said Metropolitan police force shall consist of one major and superintendent, who shall continue to be invested with such and charged with such duties as is provided by existing law; also of one assistant superintendent with the rank of inspector; surgeons for the police and fire departments; three inspectors; captains; twelve lieutenants, one of whom shall be harbor master; such number of sergeants, and privates of class 3, privates of class privates of class 1, mounted inspectors, captains, lieutenants, sergeants, and privates on horses and bicycles, and such others as said commissioners may deem necessary within the appropriations made by Congress: Provided, That the inspectors shall perform the duties at present required of captains in the force, that the captains shall command police precincts and perform such duty or duties in connection therewith as the laws and regulations of the said Commissioners may prescribe: And provided further, That the said Metropolitan police force shall continue as at present constituted until the offices created herein are filled and promotions are made by said Commissioners as provided in this act.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 9, strike out the words "three inspectors."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in connection with that I want to say that the District of Columbia has a territorial area of 69 square miles, and its police force consists of 675 members all told. The Federal Government owns one-half of all the real estate in the District. Every park, every square, every circle is owned and controlled by the Federal Government and policed by the Federal Government. The National Capitol and Public Library are policed by the National Capitol police.

The city of Chicago consists of 199 square miles of territory, and its police force numbers about 3,400 men. To command its 3,400 men it has a chief or superintendent, assistant superintendents, four inspectors, sixteen captains, and a lieutenant for every station. We seek in this bill to create a condition which will make the District of Columbia have commanding officers for its 625 men and 69 miles of territory equal to a city of 2,000,000 people with a police force of 3,400 men.

If there is any increase to be made in the force it should be in the rank and file. The men who are already in command of the present force are sufficient in number to command it. The men who are sought to be appointed through this bill would be ornaments in the department, with no practical duties to perform, and the only thing that would be created by their appointment would be an additional expense to the taxpayers of the District of Columbia and of the nation.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there is some justice in the effort to pay the men additional compensation for their labor, but there is not only no justice but absolutely no reason for the creation of these ornamental positions to which men will be selected because of the influence which they can bring to bear through political channels upon the Commissioners of the District. There is no civil service by which appointments in this District are made. They are made through pull exclusively, particularly to the positions such as these which are sought to be created.

Mr. BEIDLER. How are they made in Chicago?

Mr. MADDEN. They make them there through the civil-service commission. No man is appointed to any place in Chicago in the service of the municipality except upon his passage of a civil-service examination, which entitles him to the place for which he passes that examination. No man is appointed to any place under this District government for any other reason except the influence that he can bring to bear upon the appointing power.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MADDEN. Very well.

Mr. SIMS. I am not contradicting what the gentleman says, but I want to ask him if he does not think that the very condition which he has described calls for some form of self-government in the District of Columbia by which these things can be avoided?

Mr. MADDEN. The only effort at self-government in this bill is that it seeks to appoint men to ornamental positions, where they will have no duties to perform except to sign the pay rolls.

Mr. SIMS. Does not the gentleman think that the same influence is used to bring about appointments of those who are filling useful positions?

Mr. MADDEN. Undoubtedly. I have no objection to the appointment of men to fill useful positions; I have no objection to the raising of the salaries sought to be increased by this bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will not be adopted. In the reorganization of the Metropolitan police force, we have, it is true, created these three new positions—three inspectors. I will say in regard to them that their position is not ornamental. The offices are not created for the purpose of giving some one a place in which to put a man, but they are to perform the duty of visiting the station houses in the District, to see that the horses and wagons, the harness, the signal system, the buildings and equipments, the uniforms, and supplies of all kinds are in proper form and good condition. They are also to preside at all courts-martial, to cover various matters of miscellaneous character that may be involved in written reports. These inspectors are to be on duty during the nighttime in detail, so that there shall be in each of the twenty-four hours one of them on duty during the whole time.

Mr. MADDEN. One of the four?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. One of the three. There are three created, not four.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am now referring to the inspectors.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman said the creation of inspectors was necessitated, because they wanted one of the three on duty every one of the twenty-four hours. In other words, I presume they would have three shifts of eight hours each. They are creating four. One of them is an assistant superintendent. What is he to do?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am now referring to the matter of these inspectors. The inspectors are to perform the duties I named.

Mr. MADDEN. What are the captains to do?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The ten captains are to have charge of the ten precincts within the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. What are the lieutenants to do?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They are to have charge at night, and the captains to have charge in the daytime.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell the House how many men are on duty in the daytime and how many men on duty at night, and why it requires a captain in the daytime, when only one-half the number are on duty that travel post at night, and one lieutenant at night, when twice that number are on duty?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the usual practice, the usual method of dividing the force. Now, then, as to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that the members of the police force in the District of Columbia and the city of Washington are appointed by political pull, I wish to say that if that is true I have no pull. The pull belongs to the gentlemen from Maryland and the gentlemen from Virginia evidently if that is true.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, it is true.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But the fact is that it is not true, and that applicants for positions on the police force of the District of Columbia take a civil-service examination by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell the House whether these inspectors will be obliged to take a civil-service examination?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. These inspectors are to be appointed out of the membership of the present force.

Mr. MADDEN. Where is that stated in the bill?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Has the committee any knowledge of where the police force comes from—to what States they belong?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, they come from every State. It is a sort of joke to say that they come from Baltimore and from Virginia.

Mr. WACHTER. Well, they are all right if they do.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Is it not a matter of fact that they are appointed by influence from the different States?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No, no; that is not true. Not a single man on the force is appointed by political influence.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. None of them residents of different States?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kansas be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WACHTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kansas make that statement again in which he said that the gentleman from Maryland was mistaken. I did not catch it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I stated in answer to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. BURTON] that he was mistaken in assuming in his question that members of the Metropolitan Police force of the District of Columbia were appointed because of political influence or to gratify some political pull. It is not trine. They are appointed after a mental examination by the Civil Service Commission and after a physical examination under the direction of the District Commissioners.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman to say that the statement that Maryland and Virginia filled these places was a joke, and that thereupon the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WACHTER] arose and indignantly denied that there was no joke about it. [Laughter.] That was my understanding.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I rather think the gentleman from Ohio is right.

Mr. WACHTER. That accounts for the splendid police force that Washington has.

Mr. SULZER. How many men has the gentleman from Maryland on the force?

Mr. WACHTER. Not one.

Mr. SULZER. Then how does it account for it?

Mr. WACHTER. I have been active enough, I guess. Mr. Chairman, Baltimore City is not a village. We have a police force there consisting of 900 members. We have eight police captains and sixteen lieutenants. We have a mounted force and we have a bicycle force. We do not know anything about inspectors in our police department. I remember, so far as the intelligence and character of our police force is concerned, that two Baltimore policemen were selected at the last inauguration to protect President Roosevelt down the Avenue.

Mr. PALMER. That was because they knew the toughs from Baltimore. [Laughter.]

Mr. WACHTER. Yes; and they knew how to take care of them. In our city policemen are drawn from all over the State. Our police force is under the jurisdiction of the State government. We have a civil-service examination, together with a physical examination. We have a marshal and a deputy marshal, and those are the only chief executive officers that we have; and I want to say in all kindness to the gentleman from Kansas that I do not think he has ever had any experience with the Baltimore police force.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I never want to have.

Mr. WACHTER. If you will come over I will put you in touch with them. [Laughter.] If the gentleman had ever been in Baltimore and given any attention to the work of our police department, he would have to confess, as I think he will find Major Sylvester will confess, that there is no finer police force in the United States.

Mr. SULZER. Except New York.

Mr. WACHTER. We have a bipartisan commission as far as two Democrats and one Republican can make it bipartisan. [Laughter and applause.] And I am very thankful to say we have a board consisting of the leading citizens of our State, and hence our department is in good hands. I want to say this in conclusion, that if the gentleman from Kansas, by legislation, can bring the department of Washington, without three inspectors, to the standard of the department in Baltimore he will do the city of Washington and the nation a great service. Baltimore stands preeminent in her police department, as I happen to know, because I have been a member of the jail board. We have caught more thieves, burglars, and murderers than any large city in the nation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How does it happen that they came there?

Mr. WACHTER. Well, they came from Ohio and Kansas, and if they slipped through the hands of your police departments they did not slip through ours.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman did not get my point. It is not often that a great body of thieves drifts toward a great body of efficient policemen.

Mr. WACHTER. Oh, they do sometimes. The unexpected always happens, Mr. Chairman, that is about all I want to say, and I want to commend my remarks to the gentleman from Kansas in regard to the Washington police force.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois has moved to strike out the provision for three inspectors. I wish to call the attention of the committee to some facts in connection with the present police force. There are to-day 635 privates. Ninety-five of those privates are detailed to special duty, so that the police force consists of 540 men available for police duty in the District of Columbia. This bill provides, to command the 540 men actively engaged in police duty, 1 major and superintendent, 1 assistant superintendent with the rank of inspector, 3 inspectors, 10 captains, 12 lieutenants, and there are now 40 sergeants, so that the 540 privates will have 67 officers to command them. There is no complaint to-day that there are not sufficient officers to do the police work in the district with the exception, perhaps, in the rank of captain. There are ten precincts in the District of Columbia and but 5 captains. One of these captains acts as assistant to the major and superintendent; the other 4 are in command of station houses. Six station houses are commanded by lieutenants, so that so far as the provision in this bill increasing the number of captains is concerned I believe it is proper. It may be necessary that the major and superintendent should have a deputy, but there has been no justification shown for the addition of the three inspectors at $1,800 a year. If they divide the District into three inspection districts, we will then have a major and deputy superintendent and inspector, and three captains in each district. The gentleman from Kansas states that the inspectors are required for two reasons: First, for inspection purposes, and, secondly, to conduct the police trials. In the last year there were 150 police trials, and that would hardly be a burden to some other official in the department. The captains in the precincts are supposed to do a certain amount of inspection and ascertain whether order is kept in their district, whether buildings are inspected, and unless the major and his assistant are to do absolutely nothing except pose as ornaments there can be no necessity for the three inspectors. There is no provision made in this bill for increase in privates, which, it is insisted, are urgently needed. The force that is proposed now is top-heavy. If the officers are authorized it will be necessary to request that these officers be given men to command so that they may have some work to do.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will ask if, with the police of the number that there is now, and without any larger number of captains or lieutenants, if it is not the duty of a captain and lieutenant to keep charge of the use of the horses and see that it is properly made, and see that all the property belonging to the city is taken care of, and see all the police force is in the performance of their proper duties? Is it not their duty, also, to do the inspecting required?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a private to-day who is detailed as a veterinarian. He is a veterinarian, and he does nothing else than look after the horses of the police department. I do not recollect just now just how many there are, but comparatively few; and he is not overworked, as the investigation conducted in the making up of the bill for the support of the district this year disclosed. Why, with 540 men doing police duty here, they ask 67 officers to command them is beyond my comprehension.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In addition to that, there are in the District of Columbia a number of watchmen in charge of the public buildings, and private policemen in the parks, and if I recollect correctly they number some three hundred and seventy-five. So the police force of the District of Columbia is not burdened with the work of looking after the property of the Government and taking care of the public parks.

Mr. GOULDEN. What are these details, of which you say there are sixty?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Ninety-five details.

Mr. WACHTER. Street-crossing policemen.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Street-crossing policemen are additional to the regular force, I might say. I do not know how many there are, but they are appointed by the District Commissioners, but paid for, if I remember the law correctly, by the railroad companies. How many there are of those I do not now remember.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Twenty-nine.

Mr. GOULDEN. The abuses always are brought about by the details.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think there have been some abuses created in the department by details. For instance, they have a private detailed as a printer, doing nothing but the work of a printer at headquarters, and when he serves his allotted time he will retire upon a pension upon the theory that he has performed police duty. They have another detailed as a photographer, who does nothing but take photographs.

Mr. HULL. Does the gentleman not think it is necessary to have a photographer, taking the photographs of thieves and criminals?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In other parts of this country the departments have photographers, but this man is performing the duties of a photographer upon the theory that he is performing police work, and being entitled to a pension after he has worked fifteen years as a photographer.

Mr. GOULDEN. He is doing photographic work as a policeman?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would not say that that is police duty in the sense.

Mr. HULL. Does not the gentleman know that all of the great cities have photographers in connection with the police force taking the photographs of criminals, and are not some such in the city of New York, and more than one?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have not got them in the same way, because one of the duties of this photographer is to go out and take photographs of the place where a crime is supposed to have been committed. In my experience, evidence of that character required for the prosecution of criminals is obtained by the prosecuting attorney's office.

Mr. HULL. Is it not true that all the cities under this system of identifying criminals have them photographed, and keep photographers who always take the pictures of all criminals charged with crime?

Mr. FITZGERALD. But whether they are detailed from the force in other cities I do not know.

Mr. GOULDEN. Not in the city of New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not believe a man who works for fifteen years at police headquarters as a photographer should be retired at a certain percentage of pay upon the theory that he has been performing police duty. But I wish to say in connection with the amendment under discussion that is creating three new inspectors, I say that considering the size of the force and the duties of the force they are absolutely unnecessary, and I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, for that reason, striking these three new officers from the bill, will be adopted.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the amendment will not be adopted, because the number of the officers in this police force has been unintentionally exaggerated, I think. The sergeants have all been included in making up the officers, and the sergeants all do regular police duty.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the sergeants do not all perform regular police duty. They have a number—twenty-nine or thirty, maybe not so many, but a number—of men who are known as "desk sergeants" who do not do police duty.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But they take their turns; they perform duties at their desk or in the street, as the case may be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The desk sergeant does not perform police duties; they are simply clerks at the station house.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There are only sixty-seven officers, including thirty-nine sergeants.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I said that.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 37.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Tellers, Mr. Chairman!

Tellers were refused, fourteen Members, not a sufficient number, rising in support of the demand.

Accordingly, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend paragraph 3, page 3, line 9, by inserting the word "four" in lieu of the word "ten," after the word "inspectors."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, in line 9, strike out "ten" and insert "four."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the creation of ten captains for the force existing in this District would be an unnecessary expenditure of money. The men who do the commanding of the department are the men who are in touch with the rank and file of the department, and these men are the lieutenants.

In a hearing before the Appropriations Committee on District of Columbia matters a day or two ago this question was asked the Commissioner: "How large a proportion of the men in the police department in the District are on duty in the daytime?" Mr. Macfarland, president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, answered that during the day there are 300 men on duty doing regular patrol work within the District of Columbia. During the night there are 200 men on duty. This bill seeks to create six additional police captains, and when you ask the gentleman in charge of the bill why it is sought to create them, he says because we want during the day to have a higher ranking commanding officer in charge of the force, or words to that effect. And yet during the hours in which this higher ranking officer is on duty, the lowest number of men are patrolling their beat during any time in the twenty-four hours. The men who give the orders to the patrolmen are the lieutenants. They are the men who map out the work that the patrolmen are called upon to do, and it is to the lieutenants that the sergeants make their reports. The sergeants are the most important men in the police department. They are required to patrol the streets to ascertain whether or not the patrolmen are performing their duty. The sergeant is the man who walks around during the quiet hours of the night to find out whether the patrolman is awake or asleep.

We are told that these additional commanding officers are needed because there is greater danger of depredations in the District, if these men are not appointed to the police force. The commanding officers who come in direct contact with the patrolmen are the men you need more than anybody else. The more efficient your police sergeants are and the greater number you have of them, the more efficient your police force will be. The more captains and the more inspectors you have, the more display you will have, and the less efficiency you will have; the more expense you will have and the less work you will have done. There is no reason why this amendment should not prevail.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, there are ten precincts in the District of Columbia. The District embraces 70 square miles. There are sixty-eight organized towns and villages besides the city of Washington, within the District. The whole District is divided up into ten precincts, and the purpose in having ten captains is to have one for each of these precincts to be on duty during the daytime, the lieutenants to be on duty at night. The object of the committee in working out this bill was to make of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia one of the best, most efficient, most gentlemanly police forces to be found in America.

Mr. MADDEN. Nobody questions that.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And we think it is necessary that there should be a captain on duty during the daytime, maintaining discipline, keeping the men up to a high order of efficiency, exacting the punctual performance of duty, and that there should be lieutenants on duty at night at each of these ten precincts.

Mr. GOULDEN. Why are the captains detailed for day duty and the lieutenants for night duty?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is just a mere matter of custom.

Mr. GOULDEN. I wondered whether it was some established rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is so done in New Orleans, in Chicago, and in every other city in the country.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. These towns in the District that the gentleman from Kansas speaks of—have they any police force of their own?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. None whatever. They are policed by the Metropolitan police force.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. They have no marshals or watchmen?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. None whatever, except such as are provided by the District of Columbia.

I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The question being taken on the amendment, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 42.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in line 9 I move to strike out the word "three" before the word "inspectors" and insert the word "one."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 9, strike out the word "three" before "inspectors" and insert the word "one."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. We have passed that and had a vote upon that proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There was a motion made to strike out the three inspectors, but we are still on this paragraph. I believe it is in order to offer amendments to every part of it, and I have several.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is in order. This is a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there has been some information given as to the supposed necessity of three inspectors. I think the House by its vote on the previous proposition showed some disposition to doubt the necessity of three inspectors so that the committee may have an opportunity to pass upon this question. This amendment is offered to reduce by two the number proposed in the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the object of having three inspectors is so that there will be one inspector on duty on each of the successive shifts of eight hours during the twenty-four.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, if that argument holds good there should be two assistant superintendents, so that each of these men can be on duty eight hours. There should be enough captains to have a captain doing duty only eight hours. Here you are providing three high-priced men to do absolutely nothing but remain on duty eight hours a day, while you are leaving the number of privates at the original number, and, as your own report shows, they are compelled to work fourteen hours a day.

Now, if somebody is to be on duty all the time with a superintendent and one assistant, they will have to serve at least twelve hours a day. Why not suggest two assistant superintendents, so that the men will have sixteen hours off out of the twenty-four?

The gentleman evidently is not very familiar with large police forces, or he would not have spoken here of a captain being on duty in the daytime and a lieutenant superseding him during the nighttime. A captain in every well-organized police force is on duty every hour of the twenty-four, except the time when he is off duty for the day.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Here he has a day off in the night.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Kansas suggests that the higher officer and superior officer performs police duty during the daytime, when it is least burdensome, and compels his subordinate to serve during the nighttime, when it is most burdensome. There is no necessity in the District of Columbia police force for these inspectors. They are not in the nature of assistant superintendents. I hope the amendment will prevail, as it will reduce the number of inspectors from three to one.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAR. 6. The members of the said police force now designated as desk sergeants shall cease to be known as such and shall become privates of class 1 from and after the date this act is to take effect.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Kansas what compensation the desk sergeant now receives. What is the compensation of a desk sergeant now?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. One thousand three hundred and fifty dollars, as I now remember it. We have not changed it; it is what the present law provides.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this makes a considerable reduction in the salary for the desk sergeant, if he gets $1,350 now. They are, under this bill, to be put in class 1, with a salary of the privates in class 1.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, I misunderstood the gentleman. I thought he asked what the salary of the sergeant was. The desk sergeants are privates in class 1 who are detailed to this duty.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And this does not reduce their compensation?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No. On the contrary, it automatically increases their compensation.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAR. 7. Police surgeons shall have actually and bona fide resided in the District of Columbia for at least two years next preceding the date of their appointment, and shall be duly qualified according to law for the practice of medicine and surgery in said District, and shall have actively been engaged in the practice of their profession for a period of at least three years next preceding the date of their appointment. Police surgeons shall be members of the said police force and shall be subject to the laws, rules, and regulations for the government, good conduct, discipline, and removal of other officers or members of the said police force. Such police surgeons shall devote their entire time and attention to said police force, attend, without charge, all members of said police force and of the fire department of said District, examine applicants for appointment and retirement in and to said police force and said fire department, and attend such dependent sick and injured and examine and attend such insane or alleged insane persons as may be taken in charge by said police, and shall perform such other duties as the said Commissioners may direct.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to this fact: The present police surgeons are also surgeons of the fire department.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The present surgeons, four in number, get a compensation of $45 a month, and as such are practicing physicians who are designated for that service. This bill creates three surgeons who shall give their entire time and attention to the service.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What happens to these others?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They are dispensed with.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What happens to the fire department?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. These surgeons attend to the fire department and the police force just the same as now. If the gentleman will look at line 6, on page 7, he will see that provision is made for that.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAR. 8. The salaries of the officers and members of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia herein provided shall commence with the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1907, and shall continue thereafter annually, unless changed by Congress, as follows: The major and superintendent shall receive an annual salary of $4,000; the assistant superintendent shall receive an annual salary of $2,500; inspectors shall each receive an annual salary of $1,800; police surgeons shall each receive an annual salary of $1,800; captains shall each receive an annual salary of $1,500; lieutenants shall each receive an annual salary of $1,320; sergeants shall each receive an annual salary of $1,250; privates of class 3 shall each receive an annual salary of $1,200; privates of class 2 shall each receive an annual salary of $1,080; privates of class 1 shall each receive an annual salary of $900; members of said police force who may be mounted on horses shall each receive an extra compensation of $240 per annum, and members of said force who may be mounted on bicycles shall each receive an extra compensation of $50 per annum.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 16, page 7, strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "six."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, this is a mere typographical error in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend paragraph 8, page 7, lines 18 and 19, after the word "of," by striking out the words "four thousand dollars" and inserting the words "three thousand five hundred dollars."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, we make no change in this. This is the same salary that the major has been receiving for many years. I hope the committee will vote down the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL TERMINAL FACILITIES AT THE UNION STATION.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 9329) to amend an act approved February 28, 1903, entitled "An act to provide for a union station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to provide adequate facilities for handling mail, baggage, express, and other business or matter carried on passenger trains, the Washington Terminal Company be, and it is hereby, authorized to locate, construct, maintain, and operate tracks, switches, sheds, and other structures and facilities in and upon the parts of squares Nos. 719 and 720 lying and being between the eastern line of the terminal area, as described in said Union Station act of February 28, 1903, and the western building line of Second street east; and said terminal company is hereby authorized to acquire, by purchase or condemnation, as provided in said Union Station act of February 28, 1903, the lands and property in said squares as above mentioned; and to accomplish the purposes of this act, in addition to the streets vacated, abandoned, and closed by the provisions of the said Union Station act of February 28, 1903, and the acts therein referred to, and in accordance with the provisions thereof, the following-named streets and alleys, to wit, Chicago street and G street and all public alleys in said squares, shall be vacated, abandoned, and closed from the southern line of the said terminal area to the western building line of said Second street east: Provided, That said terminal company be authorized to acquire, by purchase or condemnation, as provided above, all the lands and property in square 721 lying between the eastern line of the said terminal area and the western building line of Second street and between F street and the east-and-west public alley between F street and California street: And provided further, That the said terminal company shall dedicate to the District of Columbia sufficient land for a street 60 feet wide on the east side of said terminal area from F street to California street: And provided further, That, except as modified by this act, all provisions of the aforesaid Union Station act of February 28, 1903, and of the acts therein referred to, shall apply to the structures and tracks authorized herein.

SEC. 2. That Congress may at any time amend or repeal this act.

With the following amendment:

On page 3 insert the following additional section:

SEC. 2. That on and after January 1, 1908, the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1899, entitled "An act for the prevention of smoke in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," and all acts, and are hereby, extended to apply to any and all steam locomotive engines of any description used on any steam railroad within the District of Columbia; and any officer, agent, or employee of any individual, firm, or corporation operating any steam locomotive engine or any steam railroad within the District of Columbia from the smokestack of which engine shall issue or be emitted dense or thick black smoke or cinders after the date above mentioned shall be deemed and held guilty of creating a public nuisance and violating the provisions of said act.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, before the motion is put, I would like the gentleman to explain the bill, and particularly that part which refers to this company handling the mails.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL].

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I am not aware that there are any provisions in the bill to authorize any new company to handle the mails.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is stated in lines 3 and 4 of the bill, "to provide adequate facilities for handling mail, baggage, and express." I did not know that any private corporation was going to be authorized or necessary to be authorized to handle the mails.

Mr. MORRELL. Oh, that simply refers to facilities which are necessary for the United States postal authorities, according to the statement made by General Shallenberger, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, to handle the United States mails, for the reason that the facilities originally provided in the Union Station were not, as the work progressed, found to be sufficient. For this reason the terminal company acquired the land described in the bill, so as to give the United States postal authorities the accommodation that they desired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then no private company is going to handle the mails?

Mr. MORRELL. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. Other than as it is handled to-day by the railroads?

Mr. MORRELL. Absolutely.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman explain the effect and meaning of this law—what it is proposed to accomplish by the law, and what reform this bill will bring about?

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, this simply allows the railroad company to acquire a certain amount of ground adjoining the new terminal station. The subcommittee visited and went very carefully over the situation. The railroad companies to-day own 96 per cent of the ground that is necessary.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. By purchase.

Mr. MORRELL. They have already purchased it. It also grants them the privilege that they asked of closing up certain blind streets, and in return for that the District of Columbia is saved all the money which would have been claimed for damages by reason of the raising of the grade of these streets. In other words, the present owners of this property, who are now the railroad companies, waive all damages for the raising of the grade of these streets.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Of course the railroad companies have the power to acquire any property under the right of eminent domain, excepting the streets.

Mr. MORRELL. Yes; the bill so provides.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This contains a grant of certain public streets.

Mr. MORRELL. Well, yes. What are the blind portions of these streets? These streets, as the situation is to-day, run up against the wall of the viaduct.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They would be of no public utility?

Mr. MORRELL. Absolutely none.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And where does the title to the soil go under the law here—in the adjoining lot owners?

Mr. MORRELL. As all other streets do in the District.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Have the companies already secured title to the lots abutting on those streets?

Mr. MORRELL. On all of those properties which abut on these streets that are now practically blind streets.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. So the effect of this bill is simply to vacate a part of a public street and authorize the railroad company to use the right that the public now has in that street for depot purposes?

Mr. MORRELL. Exactly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And that is the only effect of the bill?

Mr. MORRELL. That is the only effect of the bill. The railroads already own 96 per cent of the property.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And the street already having become practically valueless as a public thoroughfare?

Mr. MORRELL. Absolutely valueless. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the question will now be taken upon the committee amendment, without reading the bill by paragraphs. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF M STREET EAST OF BLADENSBURG ROAD.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill H. R. 15740.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15740) amending an act entitled "An act for the extension of M street east of Bladensburg road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1905.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act entitled "An act for the extension of M street east of Bladensburg road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1905, be, and the same is hereby, amended so that it shall read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the entire amount found to be due and awarded as damages for and in respect of the land condemned for the extension of M street as herein provided shall be assessed by the jury hereinafter provided for as benefits, and to the extent of such benefits, against those pieces or parcels of land on each side of said street as extended, and also on any or all pieces or parcels of land which will be benefited by the extension of said street as said jury may find said pieces or parcels of land will be benefited, and in determining the amounts to be assessed against said pieces or parcels of land the jury shall take into consideration the respective situations of such pieces or parcels of land and the benefits they may severally receive from the extension of said street as aforesaid, and the verdict of said jury shall also be for a sufficient sum to cover all the costs of the condemnation proceedings herein provided for."

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question. This bill simply provides for the extension of a street——

Mr. MORRELL. No; the opening of the street has already been provided for. In that opening there was a proviso that those who had dedicated would be exempt from assessment for benefits. Now, the committee is very much opposed to any such exemption as that, and this bill strikes out that proviso in the original bill. In other words, all who are benefited, whether they dedicated their property or not, will be assessed for benefits.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, let us understand that. The original bill provided that all those through whose land the street was extended and who dedicated the land for the street should not be charged with benefits on account of the location of the street.

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, a number of people have dedicated their land, and the street is already opened.

Mr. MORRELL. No; the street has not been opened through a portion of this land that the bill affects.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A number of property owners have already dedicated property, however, have they not?

Mr. MORRELL. I imagine they have; yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Do you believe that, after a law has been enacted——

Mr. MORRELL. I would like to reply to the gentleman from Indiana that the courts have set aside the verdicts in relation to the opening of this street on account of the manifest injustice of the award of the jury. To my mind, it is one of the most vicious practices that ever was enacted in the way of legislation—namely, the giving an exemption from assessments for benefits for simply dedicating a piece of land through which a street was to run. It is absolutely unfair to those who do not dedicate and to the taxpayers of the District at large.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It seems to me it is altogether likely the gentleman's criticism of that practice is a just one, but it seems to me that ought to have been made at the time the original law was passed. The law provided for the extension of this street, and it provided likewise that those who owned lands through which the street was to be extended should be exempt from the payment of benefits if they dedicated their lands to the public. Now, many of them acted upon that and made dedications. Now, I understand you propose by a law to take from them the benefit that would result from their dedication and charge them with assessments nowithstanding that fact. Does the gentleman believe that can be done, and have not vested rights now under that law?

Mr. MORRELL. I personally am of the opinion that they would have. It would depend entirely on the extent to which the dedication has gone, whether they have actually made this dedication or whether the court would construe that the fact of that privilege existing in the law would be notice to them that they could take advantage of it. It was, however, the thought of the committee that, in view of the decision of the court setting aside this verdict of the jury, that the committee should thus reproceed, as it were, as far as this street was concerned.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This bill does not undertake to vacate and cancel anything that has been done heretofore in the way of locating that street and securing a right of way. If you would do that and put the property owners back where they were originally so they could prosecute claims for damages for the land actually taken by the public, and perhaps for incidental damages to other property, and then subject them to the usual charges for benefit, then you would have a different standing, it seems to me, in the Congress for the passage of this bill; but having passed the original law and having promised these property owners that the dedication would exempt them from assessment for benefits, and many of them doubtless having acted upon that and made the dedication, it seems to me to be without the power of Congress now to rescind that action. These people have vested rights unless the whole street should be dedicated and the committee action taken in connection therewith be rescinded and the parties placed absolutely in statu quo.

Mr. MORRELL. I agree with the gentleman perfectly as far as the law and justice of his criticism are concerned, and I say it was the understanding of the committtee and the judgment of the committee that, in view of this whole proceeding practically having been set aside by the court, they could then put such conditions upon the bill or upon the opening of the street when this new assessment should be made that there would not be the manifest injustice there was in the first instance.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, now, does your bill provide, in making assessments for benefits, that the Commissioners shall take into consideration the value of the property that these men have dedicated?

Mr. MORRELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is expressly provided for in the bill?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, I do not like the legislation. I think we made a mistake in the first instance.

Mr. MORRELL. I agree with the gentleman there. I think the most absolute outrage ever perpetrated upon any community was the manner in which some of the streets have been opened in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GOULDEN. This has the approval of the Commissioners.

Mr. MORRELL. It has the approval of the Commissioners. I ask that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the second reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

PUBLIC CREMATORIUM IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I now call up the bill H. R. 14578.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14578) to provide for the establishment of a public crematorium in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the dead body of any person who has died from smallpox, Asiatic cholera, typhus fever, the plague, leprosy, glanders, scarlet fever, diphtheria, or epidemic cerebro-spinal meningitis comes into the custody of any officer, employee, or agent of the District of Columbia to be disposed of at public expense, said officer, employee, or agent shall cause said body to be incinerated.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to erect and operate on reservation 13, commonly known as the Washington Asylum grounds, in the city of Washington, in said District, a crematorium of size sufficient for the incineration of all bodies that can not, except at public expense, be disposed of within a reasonable time after death, and for the incineration of such other bodies as may be presented for that purpose by the persons having custody thereof. Said Commissioners are hereby authorized to make and enforce all rules necessary for the proper maintenance and operation of said crematorium, and to prescribe and collect for the incineration of bodies not necessarily disposed of at public expense fees in such amounts as may be required to defray the cost of incineration: Provided, That in any case the Commissioners may, by special order, waive or reduce the usual charges when, in the opinion of said Commissioners, to enforce such charges would be burdensome or oppressive upon the person or persons responsible for the disposal of the remains. All fees collected under the provisions of this act shall be paid to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia, and be deposited by him in the Treasury of the United States, one-half to the credit of the United States and one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That nothing in this act shall be construed as repealing or in any way modifying any of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves in the District of Columbia," approved April 29, 1902.

SEC. 4. That for the construction of a crematorium on reservation 13, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and of all necessary approaches thereto, and for all necessary grading and fencing, for the equipment of said crematorium, and for the maintenance and operation of said crematorium until the 30th day of June next following its completion, there be, and is hereby, appropriated the sum of $15,000 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, one-half payable out of the funds of the United States and one-half out of the funds of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the second reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

BURIAL SITES IN CONGRESSIONAL CEMETERY.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill H. R. 5972.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5972) granting the right to sell burial sites in parts of certain streets in Washington City to the vestry of Washington parish for the benefit of the Congressional Cemetery.

Be it enacted, etc., That the right to sell for burial sites those parts of Eighteenth and Nineteenth streets east which lie between the south side of G street south and the north side of Water street, and also those parts of south G and south H streets which lie between Seventeenth and Twentieth streets east, being the same which have been inclosed and included within the limits of the Washington cemetery, generally known as the Congressional Cemetery, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1858, Eleventh Statutes at Large, page 289, be, and the same is hereby, granted by the United States to the vestry of Washington parish in the District of Columbia, such burial sites to be held, used, and disposed of by the said vestry for the purpose of caring for and improving the said cemetery and for no other purpose; and the second proviso of the first section of said act be and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That no part of the roadways now laid out and established upon the said streets within the boundaries of the said cemetery shall be included in such sales, but the same shall be preserved and maintained in good order for all time.

SEC. 2. That the proceeds of such sales shall be devoted solely to the care, improvement, and adornment of the said cemetery; and the said vestry shall have the power to remove from any part of said cemetery any stones or cenotaphs under which no body or bodies are interred, and in consideration of the grant hereby made the said vestry shall care for, protect, and preserve in good order that portion of the cemetery in which Members of Congress and officers of the Government are or shall hereafter be buried, the privilege to the Government to bury deceased Members of Congress and officers of the Government being hereby expressly reserved.

SEC. 3. That for the purposes and subject to the limitations prescribed in the preceding sections the provisions of section 2 of the act of Congress approved July 25, 1848 (9 Stat. L., p. 250), are extended and made to apply to all streets and parts of streets east of Seventeenth street and south of E street south passing between any squares owned or possessed by the said vestry: Provided, That said provision shall not apply to any part of the grounds attached to the Washington Asylum.

SEC. 4. That before any provision of this act concerning any public street or part thereof shall go into effect the said vestry shall file in the office of the commissioner of public buildings and grounds a duly certified copy of its resolution or order accepting the provisions of this act, and agreeing to comply with the requirements of the second section; and also file in the office of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia a grant to said Commissioners of the right to enter upon the grounds of said cemetery for the maintenance and repair of the public sewer through said cemetery.

SEC. 5. That on the abandonment of this cemetery for cemetery purposes all right to the use of the streets herein referred to shall revert, without cost, to the United States, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Page 3, line 9, strike out the word "commissioner" and insert the word "superintendent."

Page 3, line 17, strike out the period and insert a comma and add the following: "and for the purpose of locating and maintaining a public sewer or water main within the limits of the streets hereinnamed."

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the second reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

WASHINGTON MARKET COMPANY.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I now call up the bill H. R. 15441.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15441) to amend an act entitled "An act permitting the Washington Market Company to lay a conduit and pipes across Seventh street west," approved February 23, 1905.

Be it enacted etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act permitting the Washington Market Company to lay a conduit and pipes across Seventh street west," approved February 23, 1905, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That the Washington Market Company is hereby authorized to lay a conduit and pipes from Center Market eastward across and under Seventh street west, for refrigerating purposes, under the following conditions, namely: The conduit and pipes therein shall be laid in a straight line, and at a right angle to the building lines of said Seventh street, to the west building line of square No. 461 of the city of Washington, and from and near the intersection of said conduit with the west building line of said square the said conduit and pipes may be continued through excavations to be made under the sidewalks on the west and south sides of said square in directions parallel to said sides, respectively, and under the pavement of the alley in said square 461, with such service pipe and connections extending to buildings on said square as said Washington Market Company may think proper. They shall be located as directed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and be laid under their inspection; and the cost of such inspection, together with the cost of replacing the pavement, curbs, and sidewalks disturbed in connection with said work, shall be paid in advance by the Washington Market Company. The conduit and pipes shall be used for no other purpose than refrigeration for the use of persons engaged in said square No. 461 in the traffic in meat and other articles of market produce; and the said company shall not rent or sell the said conduit or pipes, or any part thereof, but may sell for a time not to exceed twelve months at any one sale, the use of the fluid transmitted."

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. That said Washington Market Company shall make affidavit to the board of personal tax appraisers on or before the 1st day of August each year as to the amount of its gross earnings for the preceding year ending the 30th day of June from the conduit or conduits herein authorized to be laid and shall pay to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia the sum of 4 per cent per annum on such gross earnings."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT].

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I will say in regard to this bill that during last session of Congress there was a permit given to the Washington Market Company to lay a conduit to conduct refrigerating material across Seventh street, but there was no permission given them to cross underneath the sidewalk to the house line; and this bill is to correct that error. An amendment other than that has been the addition of section 2, which provides for a proper return by the Washington Market Company by payment of 4 per cent of their gross revenue. It is for refrigerating purposes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, does the Market Company sell or lease the privilege of using this conduit to other people?

Mr. OLCOTT. To people directly across the square, opposite the market. They already have that privilege under an act of Congress.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And it is used by these other people, for what?

Mr. OLCOTT. For refrigerating purposes entirely.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh.

Mr. OLCOTT. The people connected with the market whose stores are opposite the market need refrigerating facilities, and this bill will enable the market company to supply their needs.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I got the wrong impression of the purpose. I thought it was in the nature of a private sewer. It is for the purpose of refrigerating.

Mr. OLCOTT. Refrigeration entirely. And then, in addition this amendment to the bill passed last session provides for the payment to the Government of 4 per cent on their gross earnings.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the second reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bills favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry bills and had directed him to report the bills H. R. 14578 and H. R. 15740 without amendments, with the recommendation that they do pass, and the bills H. R. 16484, H. R. 9329, H. R. 5972, and H. R. 15441 with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bills as amended do pass.

HOUSE BILLS WITHOUT AMENDMENTS.

The following House bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union without amendments, were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were read the third time, and passed:

H. R. 15740. A bill amending "An act for the extension of M street east of Bladensburg road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1905; and

H. R. 14578. A bill to provide for the establishment of a public crematorium in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILLS WITH AMENDMENTS PASSED.

In the following House bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, the amendments were severally considered and agreed to, the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

H. R. 16484. A bill to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901;

H. R. 9329. A bill to amend an act approved February 28, 1903, entitled "An act to provide for a Union Station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;" and

H. R. 5972. A bill granting the right to sell burial sites in parts of certain streets in Washington City to the vestry of Washington Parish for the benefit of the Congressional Cemetery.

WASHINGTON MARKET COMPANY.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was the bill (H. R. 15441) to amend an act entitled "An act permitting the Washington Market Company to lay a conduit and pipes across Seventh street west," approved March 23, 1905.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill 4833, which is identical with the House bill just now reported, and the amendments to which have just been agreed to, and ask that it be substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Senate bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House bill will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the several bills were passed was laid on the table.

CONTRACTS WITH THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 127) regulating the retent on contracts with the District of Columbia, with Senate amendments thereto.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 4463. An act to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;"

H. R. 4470. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895;

H. R. 13842. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate The Eastern Star Home for the District of Columbia," approved March 10, 1902; and

H. R. 14813. An act to amend an act approved March 1, 1905, entitled "An act to amend section 4 of an act entitled 'An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia,'" approved February 28, 1901.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be, and hereby is, requested to return to the House the bill (H. R. 431) to open for settlement 565,000 acres of land in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian reservations in Oklahoma Territory.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 14171) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PERKINS, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. DANIEL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2899) granting authority to the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to dismiss midshipmen from the United States Naval Academy, and regulating the procedure and punishment in trials for hazing at the said academy, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. DICK, and Mr. TILLMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills and joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 117. An act extending the time for opening to public entry the unallotted lands on the ceded portion of the Shoshone or Wind River Indian Reservation, in Wyoming;

H. R. 12845. An act to consolidate the city of South McAlester and the town of McAlester, in the Indian Territory; and

H. R. 15848. An act authorizing the sale of timber on the Jicarilla Apache Indian Reservation for the benefit of the Indians belonging thereto.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 4300. An act to amend section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, inspectors of hulls and boilers of steam vessels—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 2769. An act to divide Nebraska into two judicial districts—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 1916. An act to provide for filling in that portion of the naval station at Honolulu, Hawaii, known as the "Reef"—to the Committee on the Territories.

S. 4426. An act to amend section 927 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, relating to insane criminals—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 4339. An act to amend section 4502 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to bonds and oaths of shipping commissioners—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

MILK AND CREAM BOTTLES.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 16944) to amend section 878 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 878 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following:

"SEC. 878a. That the following words shall, in addition to their ordinary meaning, have the meaning herein given: The word 'person' or 'persons,' in sections 878 b, c, d, e, and g, inclusive, shall include 'firms' or 'corporations;' the word 'vessel' or 'vessels,' in sections 878 b, c, d, and e, shall include 'cans,' 'bottles,' 'siphons,' and 'boxes;' the word 'mark' or 'marks' shall include 'labels,' 'trade-marks,' and all other methods of distinguishing ownership in vessels, whether printed upon labels or blown into bottles or engraved and impressed upon cans or boxes.

"SEC. 878b. That persons engaged in producing, manufacturing, bottling, or selling milk or cream, or any other lawful beverage composed principally of milk in vessels with their name, trade-mark, or other distinctive mark, and the word 'registered' branded, engraved, blown, or otherwise produced thereon, or on which a pasted trade-mark label is put upon which the word 'registered' is also distinctly printed, may file with the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia a description by facsimile, or a sample of an original package so marked or branded or blown, showing plainly such names and marks thereon, together with their name in full, or their corporate name, and also their place of business in the District of Columbia, and shall cause the same to be published for not less than two weeks successively in a daily or weekly newspaper published in the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 878c. That whoever fills with milk or cream, or with any preparation of milk lawfully allowed to be sold in vessels, with intent to sell the same, any vessel so marked or distinguished as aforesaid, the description of which has been filed and published as provided in section 878b, or defaces, erases, covers up, or otherwise moves or conceals any such name or mark, or the word 'registered' thereon, or sells, buys, gives, takes, or otherwise disposes of or traffics in the same without the written consent of, or unless the same has been purchased from the person whose name is in or upon the vessel so filled, defaced, transferred, or otherwise used or disposed of, shall, for the first offense, be punished by a fine of not less than 50 cents for each of said vessels so filled, imprisonment for not less than ten days nor more than one year, or both such fine and imprisonment; and for each subsequent offense a fine of not less than $1 nor more than $5 for each such vessels or by imprisonment for not less than twenty days nor more than one year.

"SEC. 878d. That the use, by any person not lawfully engaged in the production of milk or cream or the bottling or the selling of the same or of any other beverages composed mainly of milk and intended to be sold in the District of Columbia of any vessel marked or distinguished as aforesaid, the description of which has been filed and published, as provided in section 878b, without the written consent or purchase from the owner thereof, or the buying, selling, disposing of, or trafficking in such vessels by such person without such written consent or purchase, or the possession by any junk dealer or dealer in any such vessels without the written consent of or purchase from the owner thereof, shall be prima facie evidence of unlawful use, possession of, or traffic in the same, and shall be subject, upon conviction, to the same penalties as are prescribed under section 3.

"SEC. 878e. That upon complaint of a person who has complied with section 878b, or of his agent, to a court having jurisdiction of such offenses in the District of Columbia, that he has reason to believe and does believe, that any of the provisions of this act have been violated by any person within the District of Columbia, the court may issue a search warrant to discover and obtain vessels and their contents and may also cause to be brought before him the person or his agent or employee in whose possession or upon whose wagon or premises such vessels may be found; and if said court or justice finds that such person has been guilty of a violation of any of the provisions of this act, or of he shall impose the penalty prescribed in the section or sections so violated and shall also order the property taken upon such search warrant to be delivered to the owner.

"SEC. 878f. That the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized to make regulations and prescribe forms for the filing of labels, trade-marks, or other distinctive marks under the provisions of the foregoing amendments to section 878."

SEC. 7. That nothing in the foregoing amendments to section 878 shall prevent or restrain any person who is the legal owner of a trade-mark or label from proceeding in an action of tort against any person found guilty of violating any subsection of section 878.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer an amendment, in line 24, page 4, instead of "7," to insert "878g."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 24, on page 4, strike out "7" and insert "878g."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know what this bill is about and what it purposes to accomplish—what changes it makes in existing law, if the gentleman will explain briefly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The purpose of this bill is to extend the protection now given to persons dealing in such liquids as beer and other drinkables of that character to those who sell milk. The purpose is to protect the bottles from theft and from unauthorized use by other people.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is it not a crime now to steal milk bottles?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Are they not property?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is to say, the milk dealers' association represented to the Committee on the District of Columbia that they had absolutely no protection against the unauthorized use of their bottles by their competitors, and they brought us bottles with labels stamped over their labels that had been blown into the bottles.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand that this bill makes it a specific crime to misappropriate a bottle that belongs to another which properly bears the impress of his ownership.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is true.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And to use it for the same purpose; that is to say, to practice fraud by using another man's milk bottle, bearing his name.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This bill imposes a fine of 50 cents for every bottle so unlawfully appropriated.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I suppose if a man stole a wagonload of milk bottles, he would be guilty of larceny, just the same as if he stole any other kind of property.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The trouble about that was that they only took a few of them at a time. For instance, in an apartment house there are this morning a dozen milk bottles in front of a door. Some one other than the one who furnished the milk in those bottles passes that door, picks up those bottles and takes them, and the next day they are delivered to some one else.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Some other milk dealer uses them?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. To deliver his own milk; and the milk dealers' association claim that they have no protection against that practice.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is all there is in this bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the sole purpose of this bill.

The amendment of Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] has an amendment that he desires to offer.

Mr. RIXEY. I desire to offer an amendment to section 878b. I understand that section leaves it optional with the milk dealer as to whether he will avail himself of the provisions of the section. I merely want to make that plain, and I want to suggest to him to amend by adding, after the word "and," in line 16, the words "if so filed."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will accept that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 16, after the word "and," insert the words "if so filed."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the bill (H. R. 17359) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, reports a bill to supply additional urgent deficiencies, which will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I give notice that I shall ask consideration of this bill to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

THE AMERICAN CROSS OF HONOR.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2035) to incorporate the American Cross of Honor within the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been once reported on a former occasion, and unless there is some demand that it be reported again the reading will be dispensed with.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to raise the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. Then I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee raises the question of consideration.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas) there were—ayes 20, noes 37.

So the House refused to consider the bill.

GREAT COUNCIL OF THE UNITED STATES OF THE IMPROVED ORDER OF RED MEN.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 3202) to incorporate the Great Council of the United States of the Improved Order of Red Men.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee raises the question of consideration.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH) there were—ayes 53, noes 29.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Is it in order at this time to raise the point of no quorum?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Then I raise it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Do I understand that the bill is withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to withdraw the bill. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of no quorum?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the bill will be withdrawn. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PRINTING AND BINDING.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 128) to prevent unnecessary printing and binding and to correct evils in the present method of distribution of public documents.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized and directed to establish rules and regulations, from time to time, which shall be observed by the Public Printer, whereby public documents and reports printed for Congress, or either House thereof, may be printed in two or more editions, instead of one, to meet the public requirements: Provided, That in no case shall the aggregate of said editions exceed the number of copies now authorized or which may hereafter be authorized: And provided further, That the number of copies of any public document or report now authorized to be printed or which may hereafter be authorized to be printed for any of the Executive Departments, or bureaus or branches thereof, or independent offices of the Government may be supplied in two or more editions, instead of one, upon a requisition on the Public Printer by the official head of such Department or independent office, but in no case shall the aggregate of said editions exceed the number of copies now authorized, or which may hereafter be authorized: Provided further, That nothing herein shall operate to obstruct the printing of the full number of any document or report, or the allotment of the full quota to Senators and Representatives, as now authorized, or which may hereafter be authorized, when a legitimate demand for the full complement is known to exist.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman a question. About how much money would this bill save if it goes into operation?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. It is difficult to answer that question. I will say that if the two joint resolutions that the Commission has recommended are passed I believe that the operation of both, with the cooperation of the Committee on Appropriations (and we have the assurance that we will have that), will during the next year save the Government in the neighborhood of $1,000,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It takes this resolution in conjunction with the other one to do that?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes; the resolutions should pass together.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What does the committee mean by "different editions of public documents?"

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. It means this: At the present time the edition of all public documents is arbitrarily fixed by law.

It has been discovered that there has accumulated an astounding surplus of publications, owing to the fact that the apportionment to the Senators and Representatives is fixed by law. The individual quotas not being exhausted, accumulation results, and the effect of it all is to pack the basement of the Capitol, the basement of the Maltby Building, the old street-car barn near the Capitol, the old Government Printing Office, recently abandoned, and two large warehouses on L street with public documents for which there will be little demand, and two-thirds of which, it is safe to say, are absolutely obsolete. Now, if this proposition to print in two or more editions were to go into effect, while it would in no manner relieve the warehouses of the accumulated documents, the commission feels that it would check further accumulation. For instance, to show my friend how this joint resolution would operate, there was ordered printed by the last Congress 10,000 copies of the Swayne impeachment proceedings. Those 10,000 copies were prorated among Senators and Representatives. There were many Senators and Representatives who did not have a call for a single copy. The result was that about 7,000 of the 10,000 copies printed are left to mold in the warehouses. Now, if this joint resolution had been in force the Joint Committee on Printing, with the cooperation of the superintendents of the folding rooms of the House and Senate could, by reason of past experience, have figured that there would be a demand for about 3,000 copies of the 10,000 copies ordered, and we would have ordered an edition of 3,000 copies printed first. The quotas of the various Members and Senators would not in any manner have been interfered with.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is on the basis of the 10,000?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. On the basis of the 10,000; but there would only be enough demand by reason of requests made to exhaust the 3,000, and, as a result, the second edition would probably never be printed, and the accumulation would not take place.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will my friend allow me to ask him a question or two?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman that I will give him all my assistance if he will stop somebody from sending me irrigation papers. [Laughter.] Now, I am in dead earnest.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I know my friend is in dead earnest, and I know there are other Members in the House who hold the gentleman's sentiments, and I would say to the gentleman from Tennessee that if this resolution passes it will enable the Joint Committee on Printing to rescue the gentleman from Tennessee from that pursuit.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell us what has become of the Swayne documents? And in that connection I desire to say that I stood at the mouth of this aisle last session and objected to printing what I thought an extraordinary number of that proceeding, and one of the most distinguished and best Members of this House said to me, "GAINES, you are wrong; there will be great demand and there is great demand for that document," or words to that effect, and so I withdrew my objection.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee, answering his inquiry, that the surplus publications of the Swayne impeachment are in the folding rooms of the House and Senate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many have been sent out?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. About 3,000, as I remember it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many were printed?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Ten thousand. Now, I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that it was all right to order 10,000 printed so long as we follow the present method of apportioning the quota; but under this joint resolution, if it goes into effect, the committee could have had an edition of 2,700 or 3,000 copies printed and in no manner have interfered with the quota of any Member, but the surplus would have been prevented in that a second edition would never have been printed unless a further demand developed.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, will my friend from Indiana now yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say this to the gentleman from Tennessee, that if it had been found necessary to print a second edition of, say, 1,000, the extra cost would only have been about 885 by reason of the two editions.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman now yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I am at present yielding to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. LACEY. Well, I want to enlighten the gentleman from Tennessee on the inquiry made by the gentleman a moment ago respecting irrigation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am about back at my irrigation proposition, Mr. Speaker. I will ask the gentleman how he is going to stop that? It is a great nuisance. I would like to have him tell me and the balance of the world how he is going to stop it.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. We are simply going to prevent them being sent to Members unless ordered. If not ordered they will not be printed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman to put me down first, please. [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. Do not put him down at all until he listens to me. Will the gentleman from Indiana now yield?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. I want to say this to my friend from Tennessee: Thirty million dollars has been set apart out of the land receipts for irrigation purposes. My friend from Tennessee is on the Public Lands Committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, I am aware of that fact.

Mr. LACEY. And the first thing he does is to get up in the House here and say, "I don't want to know anything about my duty."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. When did I ever utter such a fool statement as that?

Mr. LACEY. I suggest to him that instead of stopping his irrigation papers he better read them as they come to him.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman stated that I just said I did not want to know anything about my duties. When did I make such a statement?

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman said he did not want to know anything about this irrigation matter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I made no such statement. I said I did not want any other irrigation papers to come into my office.

Mr. LACEY. Very well. Let me suggest to my friend that he read the irrigation papers.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will read them; but I will say that I propose to send every land thief in the United States to the penitentiary before I leave that committee, if I can.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that there is no quarantine in my section of the country against the irrigation publications. We find them educational and useful.

Mr. MURDOCK. May I ask a question?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Time is very valuable.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to ask the gentleman—I could not understand what the gentleman stated about it—if it is contemplated that irrigation publications will be cut off in any way?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. They will not be cut off except where they are not wanted.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will there be a more intelligent distribution?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. There will be a more intelligent distribution. The quota of each Member will remain the same, but those Members who do not desire irrigation papers will not receive them.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is the gentleman acquainted with the hydrographic report?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I have heard of it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Have you ever seen it?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I have.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is issued in about eight numbers, and it contains nothing but tables, and no man except an expert mathematician can understand it. Are we still to be further burdened with those?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that this resolution will control and protect him against that publication.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will it wipe out that publication entirely?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. No; there are those who desire that publication.

Mr. MURDOCK. Who are they?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Well, I can not call the roll at this moment——

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman can not find any in his district.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is it a rule or law that these publications are sent to Members without being ordered and distributed?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say it is not pursuant to any law, but it has been done by the superintendent of the folding room simply to make room. They were in a congested condition down there, so they have been sending out these documents in order to make room for the accumulation of more valuable documents. They seem to prefer new documents to the old documents when it comes to accumulations.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I asked the question of the gentleman because I have received three different installments of bulky, weighty documents, the last one on Friday or Saturday, called the "Triassic Cephalopod Genera of America," and I have not had a single constituent ordering it.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if it is strange to him that they desire to get rid of that in the folding room?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; but it is strange that they should think that I wanted it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I want to say this to the House——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Before leaving this matter I want to say two or three words.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to make this statement about these irrigation papers: I have had to send them to Senator TELLER, Mr. Shafroth, John E. Osborn, Senator PERKINS, and any other man I could find who had a district within 200 miles of this great Sahara out here in the West. That occurs when I am at home in Nashville and here in the city of Washington. I have written to everyone whom I thought had little enough sense to send them to me please not to send them any more, and the more I write the more they send them. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman please yield for a question?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand this resolution is directed entirely to cutting off the supply of irrigation papers?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Not at all.

Mr. MONDELL. I judged so from what has been said on the floor.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. They are using the irrigation papers as a horrible example.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, we have no particular use for the Coast and Geodetic papers out our way.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. That is true.

Mr. MONDELL. How does the committee propose to determine what number is desired of a particular publication?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. We will simply take up these questions, each one, each printed document, on its merits, with the superintendent of the folding room and others who have to do with the distribution of these documents, and by applying the law of averages, as experience has shown in the past, to limit the edition to the probable demand, and we will be able to arrive at as definite a conclusion as is possible with reference to any other subject.

Mr. MONDELL. This question will be taken up and arrived at on each and every publication?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Each publication will be taken up separately; and I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that in no instance will his present quota be disturbed.

Mr. MONDELL. On irrigation papers?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. On anything.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, just one word, and then I am willing that a vote should be taken.

I will say that we have simply gone into the question of documents already accumulated. We have had measurements taken and have experimented some with weights, and it is safe to say that there is at the present time, in the shape of accumulated surplus documents—three-fourths, if not four-fifths, of them obsolete—9,500 tons in the basement of the Capitol, in the old street-car barn, in the basement of the Maltby Building, the old Government Printing Office, and in two warehouses on L street.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Are not many of these documents desirable?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Some of these documents are desirable. This resolution has nothing to do with the distribution of the accumulated documents. It is simply to cut off further accumulation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will it not be well to provide for the distribution of those that are desirable?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. We have that in contemplation at this time. I say, Mr. Speaker, that if you should load 20 tons to a car and make the car an average length of 30 feet, it would take a train more than 2½ miles long to haul out of Washington this surplus accumulation of documents. Now, if this goes on and some sort of resolution similar to this is not passed we will either have to rent more storerooms or have recourse to the junk dealer. We paid last year, not taking into consideration the basement of the Capitol, the basement of the Maltby Building, or the old Government Printing Office, more than $13,000 for warerooms in which to store these surplus publications.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in the Fifty-third Congress these documents had accumulated to such an enormous extent that Congress passed a resolution authorizing the Committee on Printing to parcel them out pro rata among the Members, and they sent me something like two carloads. [Laughter.] About one-half of the documents were mildewed and partially decayed, and the other half were so antiquated that no human being would read them. Now, I wanted to state those facts, and suggest to the gentleman from Indiana another resolution which he ought to introduce as soon as he gets these two through. He ought to introduce one like that introduced in the Fifty-third Congress to get rid of, either by ordering somebody to burn them or parcel them out among Members, this accumulated stock of junk in the shape of printing.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The Commission has that very subject under consideration; and I will say here there are accumulating now in the basement of this Capitol CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS, bound, at the rate of 70,000 volumes every year. This resolution will take care of them.

Mr. HINSHAW. Is there any way by which the membership of this House can get hold of these documents in order that they may send them out to their constituents?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. There is no way by which any Member can get at them unless they are to his credit.

Mr. HINSHAW. I will get rid of a carload of those CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS in my district if you will give me a chance.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I ask for a vote.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman a question about the operation of his resolution, just as to how this edition will be allotted among the Members. Will it be just as the present quota?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. It will be allotted in the present way. If there is an order for 10,000 copies the apportionment to Members will be on that basis.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. My conundrum was this, Whether if there were a half dozen Members who wanted a certain publication—and I suppose there is no publication which somebody does not want—if they should use up their small quota, would that compel the publication of a second edition? Or could you turn over to them part of the first edition?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I want the gentleman to understand that the quota would not be any smaller than it is now. The quota would be in proportion to the original order.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Then any Member could get from this first edition his original number if nobody else wanted it.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. He will get just as many as he ever got.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not quite understand the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana. Under this proposition will it be possible for a Member of Congress interested in the Geological Survey reports to obtain as many or more copies than he now receives without forcing the same number upon Members who do not wish those reports?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. He will have the same opportunity to receive his quota that he now has, because the quota will be to the credit of each Member.

Mr. MANN. He has no opportunity now to receive additional copies beyond his quota?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Unless he makes arrangements with some other Member.

Mr. MANN. That is what I wanted to find out, whether under the proposition of the gentleman it would still be necessary for the man who is interested in the geological survey of the John Jones River to hunt all around the Capitol in order to make trades and obtain the copies which he wants and which nobody else wants, or whether it will be self-operative.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. There is no scheme that we could devise that would make a proposition of that kind self-operative.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that if the only point is that you print a lot more copies of documents which Members do not want, then instead of relieving the congestion below us you will only add to it.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion? I think the gentleman from Illinois is laboring under an apprehension which I believe to be wrong, that these allotments are parceled out. There will be a quota issued, for instance, to the gentleman from Illinois and to the rest of the Members, but there is no separation of this publication. It is all in one place, and you can draw out your entire quota even though there is an edition of a less number than is authorized by the resolution. You can draw out your entire number, because they are not separated. They are all kept in one bunch, in one place. You draw out to the extent of your full quota, the same as you do now. I do the same thing, and we keep on doing that until the edition is exhausted. Then another edition will be received; so that it would not interfere with a Member getting his entire quota, and at the same time there would be no accumulation.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I assure the House that under this joint resolution the present quota will in no manner be interfered with, but there will be a protection, in my judgment, against much of an accumulation.

I ask for a vote.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ALLOTMENT OF COST OF CERTAIN DOCUMENTS.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 127) to correct abuses in the public printing and to provide for the allotment of cost of certain documents and reports.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That hereafter, in the printing and binding of documents or reports emanating from the Executive Departments, bureaus, and independent offices of the Government, the cost of which is now charged to the allotment for printing and binding for Congress, or to appropriations or allotments of appropriations other than those made to the Executive Departments, bureaus, or independent offices of the Government, the cost of illustrations, composition, stereotyping, and other work involved in the actual preparation for printing, apart from the creation of manuscript, shall be charged to the appropriation or allotment of appropriation for the printing and binding of the Department, bureau, or independent office of the Government in which such documents or reports originate; the balance of cost shall be charged to the allotment for printing and binding for Congress, and to the appropriation or allotment of appropriation of the Executive Department, bureau, or independent office of the Government, in proportion to the number delivered to each; the cost of any copies of such documents or reports distributed otherwise than through Congress, or the Executive Departments, bureaus, and independent offices of the Government, if such there be, shall be charged as heretofore: Provided, That on or before the 1st day of December in each fiscal year each Executive Department, bureau, or independent office of the Government to which an appropriation or allotment of appropriation for printing and binding is made, shall obtain from the Public Printer an estimate of the probable cost of all publications of such Department, bureau, or independent office now required by law to be printed, and so much thereof as would, under the terms of this resolution, be charged to the appropriation or allotment of appropriation of the Department, bureau, or independent office of the Government in which such publications originate, shall thereupon be set aside to be applied only to the printing and binding of such documents and reports, and shall not be available for any other purpose until all of such allotment of cost on account of such documents and reports shall have been fully paid.

This resolution shall be effective on and after July 1, 1906.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LIEU LANDS IN MONTANA.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17135) providing that the State of Montana be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know the substance and intent of this bill.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I would say that this is a unanimous report from the committee. I hold the printed report in my hand. The State of Montana, through the State board of land commissioners and the Carey land tax board of the State of Montana, wants to dig a great irrigation canal. The governor of the State and the State land board have found in making the surveys that about 4,500 acres of the land granted to the State for educational purposes have been selected within the area of the lands to be inundated. They are situated about 7,000 feet above the sea level, and they want to surrender those lands heretofore selected, so as to allow the construction of a reservoir, and select lands elsewhere in place of them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there any provision in the bill to prevent them from selecting mineral lands?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Yes. The Commissioner of the Land Office drew the bill reported by the committee, and a favorable report has been had from the Secretary of the Interior, from the Commissioner of the Land Office, and is reported unanimously from the Committee on Public Lands.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the delivery to the Secretary of the Interior by the State of Montana of its properly executed and duly recorded deed or deeds reconveying to the United States of America, in fee simple, certain lands heretofore selected by and certified to said State under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the division of Dakota into two States and to enable the people of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Washington to form constitutions and State governments and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to make donation of public land to such States," approved February 22, 1889, to wit: All of section 31 in township 13 south of range 1 west, the south half of the southwest quarter, the south half of the southeast quarter of section 26; the south half of the southwest quarter, the south half of the southeast quarter of section 27; the south half of the southwest quarter, the south half of the southeast quarter of section 28; the south half of the southeast quarter of section 29; the west half of section 31; the northeast quarter, the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter, the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 32; the north half and lots 2, 3, and 4 of section 33; the north half and lots 2 and 3 of section 34; the north half of section 35, in township 13 south of range 2 west; the southeast quarter of section 26 and east half of section 35, in township 13 south of range 3 west; the south half of the northwest quarter and lots 3, 4, 10, and 11 of section 1; lot 10 of section 2; lots 1 and 2 of section 11; north half of the northwest quarter of section 12, in township 14 south of range 3 west, principal meridian of Montana; the lands so described having been selected as indemnity school land and the selection thereof having been approved by the Secretary of the Interior under dates of January 2, January 9, February 5, and April 18, 1901. The said State shall be authorized and permitted to select an equal number of acres of land from the unappropriated public land of the United States in said State, in the same manner, for the same purpose, and subject to the same limitations and conditions under which the land so reconveyed was selected and held.

SEC. 2. That the land so reconveyed shall be restored to and become a part of the public domain and be subject to disposal by the Government in the same manner in which other public lands of a like character are disposed of.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DIXON of Montana, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

KNOX'S BRIDGE, TUGALOO RIVER.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16140) authorizing the maintaining and operating for toll an existing structure across Tugaloo River, known as "Knox's Bridge," at a point where said river is the boundary between the States of South Carolina and Georgia.

The Clerk read the bill at length with the committee amendments.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, the Clerk has not read the committee amendments correctly. There has been a reprint of the bill as reported by the committee, and the lines in the report do not refer to the lines as they now are in the bill.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. The printer has not properly printed the bill in accordance with the numbering of the lines.

Mr. GRIGGS. Instead of line 13 it should be line 10, instead of line 16 it should be line 13.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman examined this bill which the Clerk has?

Mr. GRIGGS. I have.

The SPEAKER. Are the amendments properly printed in the bill?

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. That is sufficient.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRIGGS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TERMS OF COURT FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11029) to authorize the holding of a regular term of the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Virginia, in the city of Big Stone Gap, Va.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman, in view of the veto by the President of a similar bill in Texas, whether this has the approval of the Department of Justice, or whether it is likely to be vetoed?

Mr. TIRRELL. I would say in reply that the Attorney-General's Department has been consulted, and they have no objection to the enactment of this law. The facts are that the business of that section of Virginia has been increasing very rapidly. Big Stone Gap is located in Wise County. The county has doubled its population in the last decade, and its industrial enterprises are increasing rapidly. There are six other counties that are nearer to this place for the transaction of the Federal business than any other counties in the district. The population and business in these counties are rapidly increasing. This is a part of Virginia where there is more Federal business than in any other part of the State, not only on account of the increase in industrial enterprises, but it is the moonshine whisky district of Virginia, and there are many prosecutions under the revenue law.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, if it is proposed to locate the Federal courts in Wise County, I think I will not object. [Laughter.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I wish to hold up the question of objection for a moment. I would like to have read, pending that, a letter from the judge down there upon the subject, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT,
WESTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA,
Lynchburg, Va., January 19, 1906.

MY DEAR SIR: It seems that a bill (H. R. 11029) has been introduced providing for another term of the Federal courts in the western district of Virginia. In (unsuccessfully) opposing the bill introduced at the last session of Congress (33 Stat. L., p. 249) I set out in a letter sent to you quite fully the reasons for opposing that bill. At present it is probably sufficient to call to your attention the fact that the statutes now in force (32 Stat. L., 794, and 33 Stat. L., 249) I am required to hold thirteen terms of court per annum at seven different places—more than is required of any other district judge. H. R. 11029 provides for the fourteenth term.

With great respect,
HENRY C. MCDOWELL,
United States District Judge, Western District of Virginia.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I think I shall object on the strength of that letter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

DAMS ON BEAR RIVER, IN TISHOMINGO COUNTY, MISS.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15259) to authorize the North Mississippi Traction Company to construct dams and power stations on the Bear River on the northeast quarter of section 31, township 5, range 11, in Tishomingo County, Miss., which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the North Mississippi Traction Company, their successors and assigns, having authority therefor under the laws of the State of Mississippi, may hereafter erect, maintain, and use a dam or dams in or across the Bear River, in the State of Mississippi, at such points on the northeast quarter of section 31, township 5, range 11, in Tishomingo County, Miss., as they may elect, for the purpose of erecting, operating, and maintaining power stations and to maintain inlet and outlet races or canals and to make such other improvements on Bear River as may be necessary for the development of water power and the transmission of the same, subject always to the provisions and requirements of this act and to such conditions and stipulations as may be imposed by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That detailed plans for the construction and operation of a dam or dams and other appurtenant and necessary works shall be submitted by said North Mississippi Traction Company, their successors and assigns, desiring to construct the same, to the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, with a map showing the location of such dam or other structures, with such topographical and hydrographic data as may be necessary for a satisfactory understanding of the same, which must be approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War before work can be commenced on said dam or dams or other structures; and after such approval of said plans no deviation whatever therefrom shall be made without first obtaining the approval of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War: Provided, That the constructions hereby authorized do not interfere with the navigation of Bear River: And provided further, That said dam or dams and works shall be limited only to the use of the surplus water of the river, not required for the navigation of Bear River, and that no structures shall be built and no operations conducted by those availing themselves of the provisions of this act which shall injure or interfere with the navigation of Bear River or impair the usefulness of any improvement made by the Government in the interest of navigation.

SEC. 3. That the Government of the United States reserves the right, at any time that the improvement of the navigation of Bear River demands it, to construct, maintain, and operate, in connection with any dam or other works built under the provisions of this act, suitable lock or locks or any other structures for navigation purposes, and at all times to control such dam or dams or other structures, and the level of the pool caused by such dam or dams, to such an extent as may be necessary to provide facilities for navigation; and whenever Congress shall authorize the construction of such lock or other structures, the person, company, or corporation owning and controlling such dam or dams or other structures shall convey to the United States, under such terms as Congress shall prescribe, titles to such land as may be required for the use of such lock and approaches, and in addition thereto shall grant to the United States, free of cost, the free use of water power for building and operating such constructions: Provided also, That the person, company, or corporation building, maintaining, or operating any dam or dams or other structures under the provisions of this act shall be liable for any damage that may be inflicted thereby upon private property, either by overflow or otherwise, and the nearest State or Federal court shall have jurisdiction to hear suits to determine the amount of compensation for alleged damage. The person, company, or corporation owning or operating any such dam shall maintain, at their own expense, such lights and other signals thereon and such fishways as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall prescribe.

SEC. 4. That all the rights acquired under this act shall cease and be determined if the person, company, or corporation acquiring such right shall at any time fail to comply with any of the provisions or requirements of this act, or with any of the stipulations that may be prescribed by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, or in case a person, company, or corporation authorized by the laws of the State of Mississippi to erect and maintain a dam and improvements as contemplated by this act shall fail to begin the erection of said dam and improvements within two years after being so authorized or shall fail to complete the same within five years after obtaining such authority.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall in no manner interfere with or impair the rights of any person, company, or corporation heretofore authorized by Congress to erect a dam or other structures for the development of water power on the Tennessee River.

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is expressly reserved.

With the following amendments:

Page 4, line 20, strike out the word "two" and insert the word "one."

In line 22, page 4, strike out the word "five" and insert the word "three."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire a little further in regard to this stream. Is there any navigation upon it?

Mr. CANDLER. None in the world.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. It is not anticipated that any appropriation will be asked for the improvement of this stream and its navigation?

Mr. CANDLER. Not at all. This is called a river, but it is nothing but a creek. It happens to be in the county where I live. I have fished in it many a time, and there has never been any improvement by the Government at all, and there is no possibility in the future that there ever will be.

Mr. LACEY. Fishways are provided?

Mr. CANDLER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANDLER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGES ACROSS YELLOWSTONE RIVER, MONTANA.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5204) to authorize the construction of a bridge or bridges across the Yellowstone River in Montana, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the bill at length, with the following amendments:

Line 13, page 3, strike out the word "two" and insert the word "one," and strike out the word "four" and insert the word "three."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Montana [Mr. DIXON] or anybody else who knows what has become of the general bridge bill, known as the "Mann bill," that we passed here some time ago?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I think I can tell the gentleman. The general bridge bill is now at the White House. The bill that is now being considered is one of six for the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad Company, which is now engaged in extending its lines from the Missouri River in South Dakota to the Pacific coast. Actual construction is now going on, and these bills they are very anxious to have passed, having been approved by the War Department. The general bridge bill will require some time to promulgate rules, regulations, etc.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When are we to begin to operate under the Mann bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I say to the gentleman that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has ordered printed several hundred blank bills in accordance with the provisions of the general bridge bill, which will be furnished to Members of Congress, and I think that the next bill which will come along, unless some have recently passed the Senate under the old provisions, will be under the new bridge act and save a great deal of time and trouble.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DIXON of Montana, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EULOGIES ON HON. JOHN W. CRANFORD.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following House joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 111) for the publication of eulogies delivered in Congress on Hon. JOHN W. CRANFORD, late a Representative in Congress.

Resolved, etc., That the eulogies delivered in the Senate and House during the third session of the Fifty-fifth Congress on the late Hon. JOHN W. CRANFORD, a Representative in Congress from the Fourth district of Texas, who died but a short time before the end of the Fifty-fifth Congress, and the eulogies on whose life and character were delivered in the Senate and House before the adjournment of said Congress, but for some unknown reason were never published and under the law can not now be published except by joint resolution, be published in the form and manner usually followed in the publication of eulogies in Congress on deceased members.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add at end the following: "To the number of 1,000 copies to be distributed by the Representative from the First district of Texas and the regular number bound in the usual style for the family of the deceased. The usual number shall not be printed."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRIGGS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. GRIGGS. I ask unanimous consent that the present Representative from the First district of Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] be permitted to insert remarks on Mr. CRANFORD in the RECORD and that they be printed in the memorial volume.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, Congressman JOHN W. CRANFORD, my father's immediate predecessor in the House of Representatives, died shortly before the close of his first term. On account of the hurry and confusion attendant on the closing hours of Congress, the eulogies on Mr. CRANFORD'S life and character and public service were not published in the usual memorial form. Justice to his memory requires that these eulogies should be published now. If the House adopts the resolution I have introduced for the publication of these eulogies, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a brief statement of my own in reference to Mr. CRANFORD, and I ask further that this statement be published in the memorial volume with the other eulogies.

JOHN WALTER CRANFORD was one of the most gifted men in the history of Texas. Fatherless and motherless in his thirteenth year, he faced the world unaided and alone. Splendidly did he wage the war with destiny. With marvelous industry and perseverance, toiling on the farm for subsistence, refusing with painful fortitude the sleep for which night's desolate hours clamored, attending school with the savings garnered out of years of labor, he acquired a classical education, obtained admission to the bar and rose to the highest positions within the bestowal of the people. He was a senator in the twenty-first and twenty-second legislatures of Texas, having been chosen president pro tempore of the senate in the latter. He was one of the youngest men to hold so exalted a station. His service in the Texas senate was signalized by tireless energy and a broadening grasp of public affairs. He was the author of several beneficent measures which remain to-day upon the statutes of the State. In 1896 he was elected to Congress by a grateful and an admiring constituency. He died before the expiration of his first term. It may be said without extravagance that he was one of the most effective and fascinating orators the South has yet produced. He possessed in a rare and perhaps unequaled degree the quality of clothing the most prosaic facts with sentiment and pathos so entrancingly that they fell before an audience like silver arrows from a bow of gold. Through all these noble attributes shone a remarkable good nature, a generous spirit which was immediately responsive to the appeals of friendship and misfortune. As statesman, orator, lawyer, patriot, he has earned the gratitude of the people and commanded the applause of posterity.

INVITATION TO ATTEND THE CELEBRATION OF THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules be discharged from the further consideration of Senate concurrent resolution No. 16, and that the same may be now considered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution No. 16.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the invitation extended to the Congress of the United States by the American Philosophical Society, of Philadelphia, Pa., to attend the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Benjamin Franklin, to be held at Philadelphia, Pa., commencing April 17, 1906, be, and is hereby, accepted.

That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a committee, to consist of six Senators and ten Representatives of the Fifty-ninth Congress, to attend the celebration referred to and to represent the Congress of the United States on that occasion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS YAZOO RIVER, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 11026.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11026) to authorize the counties of Holmes and Washington to construct a bridge across Yazoo River, Mississippi.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 5184. I desire to state that the bill S. 5184 is identical with the bill which was passed for Montana, except this is for a bridge across the Missouri River in South Dakota, and with the bill (S. 5211) to cross the Snake River in Idaho, which the gentleman from Idaho will offer. They do not differ except in naming different rivers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent upon his statement that this bill be considered at this time, and that the reading be omitted. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 5184) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River between Walworth and Dewey counties, in the State of South Dakota.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS SNAKE RIVER, IDAHO.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I have a similar bill to offer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the following Senate bill, the title of which the Clerk will report, be considered at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 5211) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Snake River at or near Lewiston, Idaho.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from South Dakota to state that this bill is identical with the bill just passed, except the river is different.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And an amendment changing the time to begin from two years to one year and for completion from four years to three years.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to omitting the reading of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FRENCH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGES ACROSS CUMBERLAND RIVER AT OR NEAR NASHVILLE, TENN.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask that Mr. GAINES of West Virginia may be allowed to call up this bill, as my throat is so sore I can not speak.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of H. R. 14592.

The SPEAKER. This is the measure for which the gentleman from Tennessee was recognized?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14592) to authorize the construction of two bridges across the Cumberland at or near Nashville, Tenn.

The bill and amendments recommended by the committee were read at length.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GAINES of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have another little bill of the same kind—a bridge bill.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS] is recognized.

PROF. SIMON NEWCOMB.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 4198.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 4198) granting permission to Prof. Simon Newcomb, United States Navy, retired, to accept the decoration of the order "Pour le Mérite, für Wissenschaften und Künste."

Be it enacted, etc., That Prof. Simon Newcomb, United States Navy, retired, be authorized to accept the decoration of the order "Pour le Mérite, für Wissenschaften und Künste," conferred upon him by the German Emperor, and that the Department of State be permitted to deliver the decoration to Professor Newcomb.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COUSINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS CUMBERLAND RIVER AT CLARKSVILLE, TENN.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17391) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Cumberland River, in or near the city of Clarksville, Tenn.

The bill, together with the committee amendments, were read at length.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GAINES of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GRANT OF CERTAIN LANDS TO KEYSTONE CAMP, MODERN WOODMEN OF AMERICA.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8278) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to Keystone Camp, No. 2879, of the Modern Woodmen of America, to certain lands for cemetery purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a patent to Keystone Camp, No. 2879, of the Modern Woodmen of America, of the town of Keystone, S. Dak., for cemetery purposes, to the following described land, to wit: Beginning at the northwesterly corner of the ground for corner No. 1, from which the corner of sections 8, 9, 16, and 17, township 2 south, range 6 east, Black Hills meridian, bears south 57 degrees 37 minutes west, 638.7 feet; thence north 66 degrees 43 minutes east (variation 15 degrees 15 minutes east), 532.9 feet, to corner No. 2; thence south 77 degrees 44 minutes east, 557.3 feet, to corner No. 3; thence south 21 degrees 12 minutes east, 226.8 feet, to corner No. 4; thence south 52 degrees 27 minutes west, 478.4 feet, to corner No. 5; thence south 81 degrees 50 minutes west, 720.5 feet, to corner No. 6; thence north 4 degrees 53 minutes west, 277.5 feet, to corner No. 1 and the point of beginning, containing an area of 8.987 acres of land, in Pennington County, S. Dak., said patent to contain the provision that said land shall be used for cemetery purposes only: Provided, That the said association pay $1.25 per acre therefor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, who is it that is to get those lands?

Mr. MARTIN. The land is purchased by a local cemetery association in the town of Keystone, and is to be used by the Modern Woodmen of America. They have used it for a cemetery for years. This place has been settled for quite a number of years; and, as often happens in new western country, they used a piece of the public land for burial purposes for their dead.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much is there of this land?

Mr. MARTIN. It is about 9 acres. The bill is in the usual form, and they have to pay the usual price.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is being used now for a cemetery?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes; and has been for years.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MARTIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR CHINA.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reference of the bill (H. R. 17345) creating a United States district court for China, and prescribing the jurisdiction thereof, be changed from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which it was erroneously referred, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The change of reference will be made.

WITHDRAWAL FROM PUBLIC ENTRY OF CERTAIN LANDS NEEDED FOR TOWN-SITE PURPOSES.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 87.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 87) providing for the withdrawal from public entry of lands needed for town-site purposes in connection with irrigation projects under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior may withdraw from public entry any lands needed for town-site purposes in connection with irrigation projects under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, not exceeding 160 acres in each case, and survey and subdivide the same into town lots, with appropriate reservations for public purposes.

SEC. 2. That the lots so surveyed shall be sold at not less than their appraised value at public auction to the highest bidders, from time to time, for cash, and the lots offered for sale and not disposed of may afterwards be sold at not less than the appraised value under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. Reclamation funds may be used to defray the necessary expenses of appraisement and sale, and the proceeds of such sales shall be covered into the reclamation fund.

SEC. 3. That the public reservations in such town sites shall be improved and maintained by the town authorities at the expense of the town; and upon the organization thereof as municipal corporations the said reservations shall be conveyed to such corporations by the Secretary of the Interior, subject to the condition that they shall be used forever for the purposes for which they were reserved.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior may sell and dispose of rights to the use of water available under the provisions of the said reclamation act for municipal, domestic, fire, and other necessary purposes, to any city, town, or village, established as herein provided, and also to any other cities, towns, or villages in or near irrigation projects under the reclamation act. Such water rights shall be applied for by the proper town authorities subject to the provisions of the reclamation act, in so far as the same may be applicable, and the charges therefor shall be paid by such town authorities in sums not less and upon terms not more favorable than those fixed by the Secretary of the Interior for the irrigation project from which the water rights are taken.

SEC. 5. That whenever there is a development of power for use in connection with any irrigation project under the said reclamation act, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to lease, for municipal or other purposes, the right to use surplus power developed, or which can be developed, in such manner and upon such terms as he may deem proper, and any moneys received therefor shall be covered into the reclamation fund and credited to such project: Provided, That the use of surplus water for power may be discontinued on one year's notice whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior or his successors in the control of the project, the same can be more profitably used for irrigation purposes.

On page 1, line 2, insert, after the word "the," the words "appraised under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior;" on page 2, line 1, after the word "said," insert the words "under his direction;" on page 2, line 15, at the end of the line, strike out the word "the" and insert the word "public;" in line 16, after the word "purpose," strike out the words "for which they were reserved."

Strike out sections 4 and 5 and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior shall, in accordance with the provisions of the reclamation act, provide for water rights in amount he may deem necessary for the towns established as herein provided, and may enter into contract with the proper authorities of such towns, and other towns or cities on or in the immediate vicinity of irrigation projects, which shall have a water right from the same source as that of said project for the delivery of such water supply to some convenient point, and for the payment into the reclamation fund of charges for the same to be paid by such towns or cities, which charges shall not be less nor upon terms more favorable than those fixed by the Secretary of the Interior for the irrigation project from which the water is taken.

"SEC. 5. That whenever a development of power is necessary for the irrigation of lands under any project undertaken under the said reclamation act, or an opportunity is afforded for the development of power under any such project, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to lease for a period not exceeding ten years, giving preference to municipal purposes, any surplus power or power privileges, and the moneys derived from such leases shall be covered into the reclamation fund and be placed to the credit of the project from which such power is derived: Provided, That no lease shall be made of such surplus power or power privileges as will impair the efficiency of the irrigation project."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LACEY. Reserving the right to object, I wish to make some inquiry about this bill. What committee does this bill come from?

Mr. FRENCH. The bill is reported from the Committee on Irrigation.

Mr. LACEY. The bill seems to make a change in the method of disposing of town sites, and that ought to come, it seems to me, from the Committee on Public Lands. I would like to have a full explanation of it. It may be entirely satisfactory, but I would like to know a little more about it before the matter is disposed of. I would be glad to hear from the gentleman from Idaho an explanation of the bill and a statement of what changes are proposed in the town-site law by this bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire, also, to ask the gentleman if these town sites to be laid off are in the irrigation district? As I understand it, the irrigation law applies in that district. Now, are these town sites to be laid off within the irrigation district?

Mr. FRENCH. In answer to the gentleman's query I would say that should the bill proposed pass we would have a general law under which town-site tracts might be withdrawn from entry from land which is or may be set apart for reclamation under the national reclamation law. It provides that each withdrawal shall not exceed 160 acres, that the town lots shall be sold for cash, and that the proceeds of the sale shall go into the reclamation fund. They do not under the present law. It provides——

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask the gentleman if there is not now a town-site law that would apply to lands outside of irrigation districts and inside of them?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; that is true.

Mr. LACEY. The same law applies to them?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. And the methods of disposing of the lands apply to both?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; but it is not complete.

Mr. LACEY. And the Irrigation Committee has nothing to do with the disposition of land, nothing to do with anything except the method of irrigating it. There are some other provisions of the bill that are entirely within the control of the Irrigation Committee, but what I was trying to get at was to know why they complicated these methods of disposing of power and disposing of water with an entirely independent and separate proposition changing the general town-site law, a matter over which the Committee on Irrigation has no jurisdiction or control whatever.

Mr. MONDELL. The Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands has full control of all lands withdrawn under the provisions of the reclamation law.

Mr. LACEY. Not at all.

Mr. MONDELL. The reclamation law provides how these lands shall be disposed of. That provision was not made by the Committee on Public Lands. It was made by the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands. This bill refers entirely to lands withdrawn under the provisions of the reclamation law. Therefore the Committee on Public Lands can not have jurisdiction over the particular town sites. It was necessary to have this legislation in order that the reclamation officers having charge of the reclamation of these lands might provide for town sites within their projects, and it provides for town sites within the project only, and provides that the funds arising from the sale shall flow into the reclamation fund, which they would not do under the general town-site law.

Mr. LACEY. This is a very important matter, involving a radical change in the town-site land laws, and while I do not want to object, I should like at least to have time to consider and examine the bill. I do not think it ought to go through without that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is a matter of importance to the West.

Mr. MONDELL. This bill was reported some three weeks ago.

Mr. LACEY. This is the first I have heard of it.

Mr. MONDELL. The Reclamation Commission is desirous of disposing of some town sites.

Mr. LACEY. That can be done under the town-site law. I think I will object at present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

LIEU LANDS, MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15135) to empower the Secretary of War to convey to the city of Minneapolis certain lands in exchange for other lands, to be used for flowage purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and empowered to arrange for an exchange with the city of Minneapolis by which the United States shall convey to said city of Minneapolis the following-described land, situate in the county of Hennepin and State of Minnesota, to wit:

All that part of block 30 of Dorman's first addition to Minneapolis, according to the plat of said addition on file and of record in the office of the register of deeds in and for the county of Hennepin, State of Minnesota, bounded and described as follows: Beginning at the most southerly corner of said block 30 and running thence north along the east line of said block 200 feet; thence northwesterly in a straight line 394.6 feet, more or less, to a point on the southwesterly line of said block 500 feet northwesterly from the point of beginning; thence southeasterly along said southwesterly line 500 feet to the point of beginning, containing eighty-five one-hundredths of an acre, more or less.

And by which, in consideration thereof, the city of Minneapolis shall convey to the United States the following-described land, situate in the county of Hennepin and State of Minnesota, to wit:

That portion of lot 2, section 31, township 29 north of range 23 west of the fourth principal meridian, Hennepin County, Minn., described as follows: Commencing at the quarter-section corner between sections 31 and 32, township 29 north of range 23 west of the fourth principal meridian; thence south along the section line between said sections 31 and 32, 381 feet; thence north 50 degrees 30 minutes west 140 feet to the point of beginning of the land to be described; thence continuing along said line north 50 degrees 30 minutes west 335 feet; thence north 83 degrees east 90 feet; thence south 45 degrees east 60 feet; thence north 75 degrees east 105 feet; thence southeasterly 6 degrees 30 minutes, more or less, 210 feet, more or less, to the point of beginning, containing fifty-two one-hundredths of an acre, more or less. (The section line between said sections 31 and 32 has been considered in this description as the meridian.)

And also the right of flowage for the purposes of Lock and Dam No. 1, upon and over the following-described lands, situate in said Hennepin County, Minn., to wit:

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LIEU LANDS IN WYOMING.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 4628, now on the Speaker's table, identical with House bill 6314, which has been reported, a bill providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the delivery to the Secretary of the Interior by the State of Wyoming of its properly executed and duly recorded deed or deeds reconveying to the United States of America in fee simple, certain lands heretofore selected by and certified to said State under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the admission of the State of Wyoming into the Union, and for other purposes," approved July 10, 1890, to wit, south half of section 7, and all of sections 17, 18, 19, 20, 29, 30, 32, 33, and 34, in township 23 north, range 110 west; north half and north half of southwest quarter, and north half of southwest quarter of section 10, south half of section 3, north half and north half of south half and southwest quarter of southwest quarter of section 5, and all of sec-

2, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 14, 18, 20, 22, 24, 26, 28, 30, 32, and 34, in township 22 north, range 110 west; section 2, and the east half, northwest quarter, and north half of southwest quarter of section 10, in township 21 north, range 110 west; west half and southeast quarter of section 18, and all of sections 4, 6, 8, 20, 30, and 32, in township 22 north, range 109 west; west half of section 8, south half of section 22, and all of sections 6, 18, 20, and 26, in township 21 north, range 109 west; and all of sections 8, 22, and 26, in township 20 north, range 109 west; the land so described having been selected under the grant of 30,000 acres for the benefit of the miner's hospital, and grant of 30,000 acres for the benefit of penal, reform, and educational institutions in Carbon County, said selections being approved by the honorable Secretary of the Interior on March 6, 1894, and February 16, 1894, the said State shall be authorized and permitted to select an equal number of acres from the unappropriated public lands of the United States in said State in the same manner, for the same purposes, and subject to the same conditions and limitations under which the lands so reconveyed were selected and held.

SEC. 2. That the lands so reconveyed shall be restored to and become a part of the public domain and be subject to disposal by the Government in the same manner in which other public lands of a like character are disposed of.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman to explain what this is.

Mr. MONDELL. This is a bill similar to the bill which was passed a few moments ago, brought up by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. DIXON]. It allows the State of Wyoming to exchange lands heretofore selected as a part of a land grant for other lands of a similar character and under like conditions. The necessity for this exchange arises from the fact that it is impossible to carry out certain irrigation projects contemplated. Under our State constitution these lands can not be disposed of for less than $10 an acre. In order that the project may be carried out it is proposed to allow the State to select other lands than these, and let these become a part of the public domain.

Mr. MANN. I can not quite understand from the gentleman's explanation the necessity of this bill. How much land is involved?

Mr. MONDELL. About 20,000 acres. It is land which was selected under two of the State's grants for penal and eleemosynary institutions. It is proposed to carry out a large irrigation project in the vicinity of these lands, including these lands.

Mr. MANN. The lands the State now owns?

Mr. MONDELL. The lands that the State has selected. It is impossible for the State to dispose of them, because under our constitution they can not sell them for less than $10 an acre. It is proposed to allow the State to relinquish these lands in order that they may be irrigated as a part of the public domain and locate other lands of like character in other portions of the State.

Mr. MANN. But they might select lands worth a great deal more.

Mr. MONDELL. They could not select any lands that the State could not have selected at the time they selected these, and they could not select more valuable lands, because they can not be found.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MONDELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 16344) providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof was laid on the table.

GEORGE E. PICKETT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 11467) for the relief of Capt. George E. Pickett, paymaster, United States Army, with a Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—ALBERT S. SCROGGINS.

Mr. SCOTT. I submit an order which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order will be read.

The Secretary read the order, as follows:

Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Senate bill 6333, a bill granting an increase of pension to Albert S. Scroggins, Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the object of the provision "without leaving copies?" I do not know whether that is usual or not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the rule to require that copies shall be left only in case there has been an adverse report. The order just read discloses the fact that no adverse report has been made.

The order was agreed to.

D'ANGER'S BUST OF WASHINGTON.

On motion of Mr. WETMORE, it was Ordered, That the 500 copies of the report of the proceedings on the occasion of the presentation to the United States of a bust of Washington by certain citizens of France, which have been bound in cloth and lately delivered to the Senate document room, be transferred to the Senate folding room and placed to the credit of Senators; and that the fraction remaining after such allotment shall be placed to the credit of the Committee on the Library for distribution.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND THE DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that the joint resolutions which have just been received from the House of Representatives relating to public printing and binding, etc., be laid before the Senate with a view to their passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 127) to correct abuses in the public printing and to provide for the allotment of cost of certain documents and reports was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That hereafter, in the printing and binding of documents or reports emanating from the Executive Departments, bureaus, and independent offices of the Government, the cost of which is now charged to the allotment for printing and binding for Congress, or to appropriations or allotments of appropriations other than those made to the Executive Departments, bureaus, or independent offices of the Government, the cost of illustrations, composition, stereotyping, and work involved in the actual preparation for printing, apart from the preparation of manuscript, shall be charged to the appropriation or allotment of appropriation for the printing and binding of the Department, bureau, or independent office of the Government in which such documents or reports originate; the balance of cost shall be charged to the allotment for printing and binding for Congress, and to the appropriation or allotment of appropriation of the Executive Department, bureau, or independent office of the Government, in proportion to the number delivered to each; the cost of any copies of such documents or reports distributed otherwise than through Congress, or the Executive Departments, bureaus, and independent offices of the Government, shall, where be, shall be charged as heretofore: Provided, That on or before the 1st day of December in each fiscal year each Executive Department, bureau, or independent office of the Government to which an appropriation or allotment or appropriation for printing and binding is made, shall obtain from the Public Printer an estimate of the probable cost of all publications of such Department, bureau, or independent office now required by law to be printed, and so much thereof as would, under the terms of this resolution, be charged to the appropriation or allotment of appropriation of the Department, bureau, or independent office of the Government in which publications originate, shall thereupon be set aside to be applied only to the printing and binding of such documents and reports, and shall not be available for any other purpose until all of such allotment of cost on account of such documents and reports shall have been fully paid.

This resolution shall be effective on and after July 1, 1906.

Mr. PLATT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLATT. I move that the joint resolution (S. R. 44) to correct abuses in the public printing and to provide for the allotment of cost of certain documents and reports be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 128) to prevent unnecessary printing and binding and to correct evils in the present method of distribution of public documents; which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized and directed to establish rules and regulations, from time to time, which shall be observed by the Public Printer, whereby public documents and reports printed for Congress, or either House thereof, may be printed in two or more editions, instead of one, to meet the public requirements: Provided, That in no case shall the aggregate of such editions exceed the number of copies now authorized or which may hereafter be authorized: And provided further, That the number of copies of any public document or report now authorized to be printed or which may hereafter be authorized to be printed for any of the Executive Departments, or bureaus or branches thereof, or independent offices of the Government may be supplied in two or more editions, instead of one, upon a requisition on the Public Printer by the official head of such Department or independent office, but in no case shall the aggregate of said editions exceed the number of copies now authorized or which may hereafter be authorized: Provided further, That nothing herein shall operate to obstruct the printing of the full number of any document or report, or the allotment of the full quota to Senators and Representatives, as now authorized, or which may hereafter be authorized, when a legitimate demand for the full complement is known to exist.

Mr. PLATT. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLATT. I move that the joint resolution (S. R. 43) to prevent unnecessary printing and binding and to correct evils in the present method of distribution of public documents be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, after the close of the morning business, with the permission of the Senate, I will submit some remarks in connection with the pending rate bill.

RAINY RIVER BRIDGE IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 4825) to provide for the construction of a bridge across Rainy River, in the State of Minnesota.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 13, after the words "United States," to insert: "and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies, and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal, telegraph, and telephone purposes;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limits shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transportation over the same of the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile for the transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said bridge, and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post roads in the United States; and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies, and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal, telegraph, and telephone purposes.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 2, line 22, after the word "river," to strike out the words "leaving a clear waterway of not less than —— feet on one side of the pivot pier" and insert "affording such clear widths of openings as the Secretary of War may decide to be necessary;" so as to read:

SEC. 3. That unless the Secretary of War shall find and determine that said bridge as actually located is situate at a point where the said Rainy River is not navigable for boats, the said bridge shall have a draw or draws over the main channel of said river, affording such clear widths of openings as the Secretary of War may decide to be necessary, unless the plan of said bridge, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEES OF JURORS AND WITNESSES.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5361) amending the act of August 3, 1892, clause 361, entitled "An act fixing the fees of jurors and witnesses in the United States courts in certain States and Territories." (27 Stat. L., p. 347.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 4, before the words "three hundred and sixty-one," to strike out "clause" and insert "chapter;" and on page 2, line 5, after the word "day," to strike out "during such attendance;" so as to read:

That the act of August 3, 1892, chapter 361, Twenty-seventh Statutes at Large, page 347, entitled "An act fixing the fees of jurors and witnesses in the United States courts in certain States and Territories," be so amended as to read: "That jurors and witnesses in the United States courts, including commissioners' courts, in the States of Wyoming, Montana, Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada, Idaho, Colorado, and Utah, and in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona shall be entitled to receive for actual attendance at any court or courts, including commissioners' courts, and for the time necessarily occupied in going to and returning from the same, $3 a day, and 15 cents for each mile necessarily traveled over any stage line, or by private conveyance, and 5 cents for each mile over any railway, in going to and returning from said courts.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 9, after the word "Provided," to insert:

That for such portion of his travel as shall be made by railway such witness shall be entitled, at his election, to receive, in lieu of his mileage for such portion of his travel, the amount of his actual and necessary expense for railway fare, not to exceed, however, the amount required to be paid as railway fare for carriage over the most direct route available for his travel in going to and returning from the place of trial or hearing: And provided further,

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill amending the act of August 3, 1892, chapter 361, entitled 'An act fixing the fees of jurors and witnesses in the United States courts in certain States and Territories.' (27 Stat. L., p. 347.)"

PITTSBURG STANDARD COAL COMPANY.

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to recur to morning business for a few minutes, if the Senator will kindly permit me. I got in a little late.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business will be received.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I have just explained, I was not here when this order of business came up; and I send to the desk and ask to have read a communication relating to the railroad situation in Pennsylvania. I do this in accordance with the kind suggestion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] that this matter should be brought to the attention of the Senate and of the country every day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina sends to the desk a communication, which he asks may be read. Without objection, the Secretary will read it.

The communication was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

PITTSBURG STANDARD COAL COMPANY,
Carrick, Pa., February 27, 1906.

Hon. BENJAMIN TILLMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Hepburn bill relating to railway discrimination has some attraction for our company. We are sufferers by the railway company's discrimination against us, and desire that our case be submitted to the Commission investigating this matter. Our coal property is situated 31 miles west of Pittsburg on the Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis Railway. We purchased coal lands, opened our mines, built our tipple, and graded for side tracks, bought railway ties and other material, and had options on other coal lands adjoining. We have expended over $50,000 on this property and contemplated investing $150,000, but the railway company emphatically refused to make any switch connection for us with their main line in order to transport our product to market. We began negotiations for a switch connection with the railway company February, 1903 (three years ago), and we have no assurance to-day that we will ever obtain a switch connection from the said railway company. Our investment is laying idle and our improvements going to decay. In writing to the first vice-president, Mr. James McCrea, of this railway company, he replied to me on the 23d instant that he had no objection to taking our case before the Commission. In submitting this matter to your consideration it brings our case before the public, and we are anxious to have it decided in that manner.

Yours, very truly, SAMUEL KINSEY, President.

CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS BY NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, there is another little matter to which I desire to refer, or rather upon which I want some information.

In the earlier days of the session I introduced a resolution, and the Senate referred it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, relating to contributions by national banks to campaign funds. A couple of weeks ago that committee kindly gave me a hearing to make such an exhibit of facts as I had gathered; and I was a little astonished to find that the crime, for I think it must be a crime under the law, to which the resolution had reference, was acknowledged by everybody. There seemed to be no dispute about it at all in the minds of the committee, saying that the national banks had contributed to the campaign fund in 1896, that everybody knew it, that they had contributed to the storm sufferers, and other things like that, etc. The committee practically refused or seemed to pooh-pooh the idea of an investigation, and my action was met by having a subcommittee appointed to consider and report a bill to the Senate, by which this practice or offense against the laws should be stopped and some stringent legislation had. I am aware that one of the members of that committee has been absent on account of sad and unavoidable circumstances, and therefore I am not disposed to find any fault with the inaction or nonaction of the committee in not moving actively along this line.

But recent events have brought to my attention another phase of this subject which I had not thought of when I went before the committee. I noticed in the papers some days ago that there was some question in the mind of District Attorney Jerome as to whether there was any law under which the trustees of the insurance companies in New York, who had been guilty of this same act, were punishable, whether they had committed any crime under the statute which would carry them into court under an indictment. Judge O'Sullivan did not seem to agree with the district attorney, and thus we have two great lawyers, one on the bench and the other ready to go there as far as ability goes, or to go higher, who do not seem to think alike in regard to that insurance transaction.

But in regard to national banks there can be no doubt whatever, and it is that phase of the subject which causes me to reopen this question, with the purpose of directing the attention of the Senate to it. I want to read for the further information of those who are not entirely familiar with it, section 5209 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 5209. Every president, director, cashier, teller, clerk, or agent of any association who embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, or credits of the association; or who, without authority from the directors, issues or puts in circulation any of the notes of the association; or who, without such authority, issues or puts in circulation any certificate of deposit, draws any order or bill of exchange, makes any acceptance, assigns any note, bond, draft, bill of exchange, mortgage, judgment, or decree; or who makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of the association, with intent, in either case, to injure or defraud the association or any other company, body politic or corporate, or any individual person, or to deceive any officer of the association, or any agent appointed to examine the affairs of any such association; and every person who with like intent aids or abets any officer, clerk, or agent in any violation of this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be imprisoned not less than five years nor more than ten.

Now, Mr. President, if it can be shown that national banks in 1896, and probably since, have been guilty of disobeying this section and of contributing of the funds of the bank to campaign committees, it seems to me there is a clear case of crime which ought to be investigated, and the men guilty of this disobedience of law called to account.

I am not prepared this morning to go into the details of this subject, but I will state, as a matter of general information just now, which I will undertake to prove at the proper time, that in one city of the second size, of which I have the name, in 1896 $17,000, or thereabouts, was contributed to the Republican campaign fund. And I have reason to believe that year the national banks of the United States contributed probably a million dollars to that campaign fund. It was with a view of calling briefly this morning the attention of the Senate to these facts that I have thought it worth while to mention the matter in connection with some other things which are transpiring that are of very great general interest, and which relate more particularly to the railway rate legislation with which the Senate is now wrestling.

For instance, Judge Humphreys the other day rendered a very important and far-reaching decision in regard to the criminality of the officers of certain corporations, under which those officers have been invited to put on their hats and walk out of court; and we are told blandly and, I suppose, authoritatively that that will probably be the end of it, although there is some discussion of the propriety and necessity of an appeal to the Supreme Court to see whether that court holds the same view as Judge Humphreys. I saw a cartoon——

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. LODGE. Was not that a criminal prosecution?

Mr. TILLMAN. I so understand it.

Mr. LODGE. Then how is the United States going to appeal?

Mr. TILLMAN. That is my trouble. I find so much anxiety here to take care of the corporations and so little desire to punish the corporator.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no. The Senator said the question of the propriety of an appeal was being considered.

Mr. TILLMAN. I saw it in a newspaper.

Mr. LODGE. The propriety of an appeal can not be considered, because the United States is unable to take an appeal in such a case, as I understand.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am glad the Senator's superior knowledge of the law illuminates my ignorance. I had, however, read at some time, somewhere, that a man could not be put in jeopardy of life or limb in the way of a criminal indictment but once. I am glad the Senator reminds me there is no appeal; but Judge Humphreys, one of these immaculate Federal judges of whom we hear so often, has caught that corporation by the nape of the neck, and in a cartoon which I saw a day or two ago the situation is graphically depicted of a policeman who has grabbed a man of straw—one of those scarecrows which we hang up in the South and elsewhere to keep the crows from pulling up the corn. It is stuffed with straw, it has on a hat and a coat, and has all the semblance of a man, but there is nothing about it that you can hurt, unless you tear him open and let out the straw. Here we have this man of straw hurried off to jail by this policeman, while peeping over the fence a man is seen. His face is full of grins, his pocket is full of money, with a bag or two hanging on his hand, and the officer is dragging off the blessed little innocent while the criminal hangs over the fence and some inquiring citizen, who has been robbed by these beef packers and these other instrumentalities of corporations, says:

why don't you catch the fellow on the fence?" I am here in the rôle of an attorney for the goose, to ask my friend from Wisconsin, or anybody else who chooses to answer, why we are so infernally solicitous about taking care of the corporations and only interfering with this man of straw in the legislation we are enacting here, or trying to enact, and why we do not pay any attention to the actual man? We forget the man in our efforts to redress all these grievances and wrongs, and we go to protecting this artificial man, this corporation, and we are almost shedding tears here in regard to the possible invasion of the rights of this impersonal creature, but we do not seem to care or take any concern about the man of blood with a belly to feed. That is what concerns me, and when I look about I see Judge Humphreys turn loose these people. Probably it was lawful; but if that is the law, then the law ought to be changed. That is what I contend here.

Mr. Jerome also has fallen from grace as a great reformer. How we go. The dear people are told that it is unconstitutional to do any other way than the way we are doing; that we are trying our level best to help them somehow or other, but our dear old Constitution stands in the way. Talk about Judge Humphreys and his decision——

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure, always.

Mr. SPOONER. I am quite at a loss to understand why the Senator from South Carolina refers to me by name.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not said anything about you.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator said "the Senator from Wisconsin" in referring to the decision of Judge Humphreys in the beef trust case.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is just a parallel case, because the Senator devoted his great intellect for five hours, sick, though he was, to demonstrate the great damage and harm that will come to these railroad corporations by having them submit to the decision of a railroad commission appointed to protect the people of the country against just such infamies as I have had read at that desk. I was just led along by parallel reasoning to try to think out why it is we are so anxious to take care of these corporations, while we seem to ignore and forget the man.

Mr. SPOONER. That shows, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, how dangerous and foolish it is for a man to attempt to legislate, as it would be for a judge to attempt to decide a question, with sole reference to the characteristics of either one or the other of the parties.

The Senator does not seem to have been able to comprehend that the contention for which I argued the other day had no reference whatever, or involved in no respect, any bias for corporations. The Senator ought to be able to distinguish between parties against whom there may be prejudice or in favor of whom there may be bias, and principle.

The argument which I made here the other day, Mr. President—and I regretted the length of it as well its discursiveness—was made upon a principle. It was made for the bill, Mr. President, which the Senator from South Carolina has in charge. If I am right in my contention—and as to that I have very little doubt—no Senator capable of intelligent judgment or action upon this bill ought to be willing to have a provision of that kind incorporated in it. It ought to be, if my contention is a correct one, the strong and earnest desire of the Senator from South Carolina, having this bill in charge, to withhold from the bill a provision which under the Constitution would endanger its validity if it became a law.

This is the first time I have ever known a decision of a court to be impeached by the authority of a cartoon——

Mr. TILLMAN. I have known cartoons to play most important parts in great transactions in this country.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; but not in the courts. I saw a cartoon in a newspaper the other day of the Senator, in which he lies sprawling, having been kicked over by a donkey. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; and the last one I saw had me on that donkey and the elephant was tied to the donkey's tail, and we were proceeding down the road. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. That was another cartoon. How far that was an accurate illustration of the situation I do not undertake to say; but that was another cartoon. I myself saw a cartoon in a newspaper the other day, in which it was attempted to clothe me in the pants, vest, and coat of Secretary Taft.

Mr. TILLMAN. Which, of course, you did not fit. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. Which, of course, I did not fit. It was ludicrous, but it was fine, and I enjoyed it; but it illuminated no principle, nor did it tend to the correct application of any principle.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina is yielding possibly a little too much to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. It does not follow, necessarily, because the defendant in a criminal case can not twice be put in jeopardy, that it is beyond the power of the legislature to send to the appellate court the question for the guidance of future courts in the determination of such cases. There has been a law in force in this District—for how many years I do not know—which authorizes an appeal in certain criminal cases, providing that the determination shall not adversely affect the defendant, if he had been placed in jeopardy, but in order that the question may be determined and the rule of decision established for the future conduct of the Government. There is a bill pending now before the Judiciary Committee to extend that principle throughout the country, that is receiving the serious consideration of the Committee on the Judiciary. It is recommended by the Department of Justice. So the Senator will see that this question is not being ignored; but that, on the contrary, it is being carefully considered; and I think he will agree that it is one of those questions which can better be considered carefully and deliberately by a committee of lawyers than perhaps by a committee of laymen. So the Senator must not assume that what he suggests as necessary in the public interests may not be done possibly through appropriate legislation, without violating the constitutional guaranty which prevents a citizen from being twice put in jeopardy.

Now, if I have not too long interrupted the Senator, I have endeavored to bring his attention to the situation as it really is, so far as such legislation is concerned.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator has made a little excursion away from the line of thought that I was trying to follow, and seems called upon to defend himself from an attack which I did not make. I was merely making an allusion to the condition which exists here. I do not impugn any man's motives, and I do not impugn the Senator's entire honesty and integrity of purpose.

Mr. SPOONER. I had a notion that when the Senator referred to the infernal anxiety of some people for the interests of corporations he might have added, to make the sentence complete, their infernal want of interest in the people, but that was perhaps going further than the Senator intended; but it meant something.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, possibly my language is always more or less lurid [laughter], and it probably cuts deeper than I intend for the reason that I take the first word that exactly conveys my meaning, without undertaking to shade it off or oil it or sweeten it, but it does appear to me an infernal anxiety, if it exists in any man here, to protect the corporations and leave the man out of consideration.

Mr. SPOONER. Nobody wants to do that.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, I hope the bill, when we get through with it, will prove that. We are not on that bill now, however, but I am just throwing in a few side remarks in relation to it and the general cussedness of the situation. [Laughter.]

I was proceeding to illustrate this latter condition by pointing out this remarkable opinion of Judge Humphreys. It may be entirely in accordance with the law as it is written, but that only shows that we write laws here and enact them which have more concern for the corporations in one sense than they have for the man, and the other has more concern for the man than it has for the corporation. In this case our law leaves the corporations in jeopardy of a fine of $2,000, or something like that; but the individuals who are the agents of the corporations, who do its thinking, who do its acting, and without whom it is dead, go scot free. I was proceeding to illustrate this unfortunate situation by calling attention to the fact that the Attorney-General, our distinguished head of the Department of Justice, who is no doubt a very brilliant lawyer, and who has shown great ability in this prosecution, has "fallen down," as the phrase is, to use a slang word, in his efforts to punish these beef packers, these fellows who handle the meat. No doubt he feels considerably mortified and nonplused, but I could not help but be reminded of that simile of Byron:

> So the struck eagle, stretch'd upon the plain,
> No more through rolling clouds to soar again,
> View'd his own feather on the fatal dart,
> And wing'd the shaft that quivered in his heart.

The Attorney General is the direct progenitor, so far as I am able to discover, of the doctrine that the corporation can be punished, that the man of straw can be punished, but the active agents—the eyes, the head, and the hands of that corporation—are entirely immune. In the language of the Attorney-General, which he gave us in his argument last week, "they are dipped in the immunity bath." In his opinion in the Santa Fe case, which was unfortunately indorsed and corroborated by President Roosevelt, we were told that the vice-president of that road, Mr. Morton, had been shown—I believe he acknowledged it, in fact—to have granted rebates, and so forth, and so on. "Oh, no," says Mr. Moody. "Oh, no," says Mr. Roosevelt. "By no means punish Mr. Morton; he is clean; he is high; he is honorable, and all that; and go after this dirty railroad." And here you go. Judge Humphreys comes along. He says the President and Attorney-General are not high judicial officers. There may be no precedents for this—though the Senator from Wisconsin can inform me if there are, for he is a higher authority. President Roosevelt says this is good law. Mr. Attorney-General Moody says this is good law. Therefore, if it is good law in the Santa Fe case, why is it not good law in the packers' case? And Mr. Moody gets "hoist by his own petard," so to speak.

Mr. SPOONER. You can not do it under existing law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Are we going to change the law? Why did we ever enact such a law? The Senator not being responsible for it, probably has no right to answer, but that is where these people——

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator asked me a question. I should like to answer it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. We have not enacted such a law.

Mr. TILLMAN. How, then, did it come about that this judge can not decide that this is the situation?

Mr. SPOONER. That is what I am speaking about. If the Senator will possess his soul in patience after asking me a question until I can answer it, I shall be glad.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will sit down and be very patient.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no; that is not necessary.

Mr. TILLMAN. I can get up again.

Mr. SPOONER. The Attorney-General could not do otherwise under existing law. He asks us to enact a law under which he might appeal.

Mr. TILLMAN. Would not that be retroactive in this case?

Mr. SPOONER. It would not apply to these men.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, these fellows, then, go scot-free?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator interrupts again. No wonder the Senator will never learn any law. He can not keep still long enough. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Does it take stillness to make a lawyer? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. It takes——

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought it took mental ability and logic and the power of analysis.

Mr. SPOONER. It takes stillness on the part of a student to teach him law.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will sit still, then, and learn at the feet of my learned tutor.

Mr. SPOONER. Not at all; that is not a fair thing to say.

Mr. TILLMAN. I say it in all respect and in all sincerity, because my friend knows he is a learned lawyer. If not, I will tell him so, if he wants my opinion.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator wants to insist upon my admitting that myself my modesty compels me to decline. [Laughter.]

Possibly there ought to be such a law enacted. Long ago there was not, except as to this District. The Attorney-General and the Department of Justice ask us to enact one under which an appeal may be taken by the Government in such a case, even in case of acquittal, in order to advance to a court of appellate jurisdiction some question involved in the case which the public interest requires shall be finally adjudicated and settled for guidance in future cases. That bill is pending before the committee. Of course it can not be enacted so as to make it retrospective in its operation upon these men. That is impossible under the Constitution; but the Senator would not say because it can not be made retrospective——

Mr. TILLMAN. "Retroactive," is it not?

Mr. SPOONER. Well, "retroactive"—that we should not pass it, if it would be proper to do it, in order to establish a rule for the future.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course, Mr. President, I would consider that we were very derelict if we had discovered a great loophole in the law through which these scoundrels are going to escape punishment, if we should not immediately remedy that; but I am afraid, as I remarked the other day, that we are getting ready to provide some scheme of "how not to do it" in the railroad business.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator would only become cured of that jaundice, which constantly affects him and makes everything upon which he casts his eye yellow, he would be healthier mentally. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Anything more? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. Overcredulity, Mr. President, is a weakness; oversuspicion is none the less so. If there is any reason in the world why the Senator should look upon his colleagues in this Chamber in connection with their proposed action upon this measure with suspicion or with the thought that it is not the universal desire in the Chamber to do precisely what ought to be done as to this measure, I confess that I do not know what it is. The Senator may; but I do not.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I may be jaundiced, as the Senator says, and may see things through yellow glasses; but, being a straightforward, frank, blunt man, as I am, and as everybody recognizes me to be, I can not understand these finements, these hair-splitting distinctions, and these most erroneous pleas for a certain interpretation of the law which is against common sense. The Senator, of course, considers me as wholly unworthy of notice——

Mr. SPOONER. Not at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. In discussing a law point; but he never has been able, and I do not believe he ever will be able, to convince the everyday, common people of this country that whatever Congress can create and Congress can destroy Congress can not control.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. He found the other day a great distinction or difference between the meaning of the words "judicial power" and "jurisdiction."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. FORAKER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is before the Senate, and what is it we are discussing, Mr. President?

Mr. TILLMAN. I am before the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAKER. There is nothing unusual in that. The Senator is always before the Senate when he can get a chance to be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Ohio that this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. FORAKER. So I understood.

Mr. TILLMAN. I asked consent, not in the ordinary way, but I said "with the indulgence of the Senate" I wanted to make a few remarks. Now, if the Senator wants to take me off my feet I will sit down, but I will notify him that the very first bill that comes up, or anything else, I will get right up and talk along this same line; so he had better let me get through now.

Mr. FORAKER. I am well aware of that peculiar characteristic of the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; that is not a peculiar characteristic, but a blessing to this body.

Mr. FORAKER. That is true——

Mr. TILLMAN. That is one thing we have as an inheritance from our predecessors here, that here is a place of freedom of debate, where there is no gag rule.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, if the Senator would allow me just a moment, I could tell him why I interrupted him.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have never objected to having the Senator interrupt me. He can interrupt me for a minute or for five or for fifteen minutes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the rule be enforced, Mr. President.

Mr. FORAKER. There goes the Senator from South Carolina again.

Mr. TILLMAN. He did not go off that time, however.

Mr. FORAKER. What I wanted to call attention to was the fact that the Senator had asked consent to occupy the time of the Senate for a few moments——

Mr. TILLMAN. Not moments; minutes.

Mr. FORAKER. To make some explanation of some sort. Let it be "minutes," then. He proceeded to make a statement concerning which I wanted to make an answer, because it directly concerns a matter I have in charge. I observed he was drifting into a general discussion of the rate bill, of which he has charge, and which is all the while on his mind, but realizing that he was drifting off into that general discussion, I was about to interrupt him with a view to calling him back to the point upon which he started out to address the Senate, so that I could make answer to it in a brief way. Then we could take up the rate bill in order, and with some kind of orderly procedure proceed to consider it and the various amendments which have been offered. I am very anxious——

Mr. TILLMAN. Is the Senator through now?

Mr. FORAKER. I am through with the inquiry that I had——

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, will the Senator let me get through with a few little remarks that I wanted to make, and then resume the thread of the inquiry which he wanted to answer?

Mr. FORAKER. Before I consent to an indefinite occupation of the time of the Senate by the Senator I should like to know whether he wants to proceed to a discussion of the rate bill?

Mr. TILLMAN. No, sir; but the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] wants to discuss the rate bill at 2 o'clock, and we will take it up then. I want to finish a few little remarks by way of getting rid of some of the yellow blood in me.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. It takes so long to do that that I do not want to yield indefinitely, but I will, of course, accommodate the Senator if he wishes to occupy but a short time.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will get through inside of three minutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure, always.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, more than half an hour ago I was recognized by the Chair and yielded to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. Of course I will not interrupt the Senator if he is to conclude soon; otherwise I will ask for the regular order. If the Senator intends to conclude in a reasonable time of course I shall not interrupt him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I have just remarked, I have never seen any time in the Senate when by any such proceeding as that a Senator can get the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no disposition to cut off the Senator. The Senator knows that.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will allow me to conclude in my own way in my own time I will do so; otherwise I will conclude in some other way under the rules of the Senate during the day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. I recognize that I owe the Senator from New Hampshire an apology for occupying so much of his time.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator need not make an apology to me. I am always glad to yield to him or to any other Senator, and I certainly have no disposition to gag him. Of course I yield to him to conclude his remarks.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, Mr. President, I am so torn up and so befuddled that I do not know "where I was at," as the phrase is.

Mr. FORAKER. Perhaps I can bring the Senator back, if he will allow me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly. Then we will uncoil this somehow or other.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator opened his remarks with a reference to the nonaction, as he termed it, of the committee or subcommittee having in charge the proposed legislation with respect to campaign contributions from national banks. Now, it so happens that I am chairman of the subcommittee which has that matter in charge. The matter has come to our subcommittee in the form of a bill introduced by the Senator from South Carolina on that subject. The Senator was heard in support of his bill before the committee, and the committee referred it to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], and myself as a subcommittee to examine and report to the full committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me now?

Mr. FORAKER. In a moment, if the Senator will allow me. Only yesterday, when the Senator made inquiry of me as to what progress we were making, I reported to him that we had been unable to have a meeting of the subcommittee, because of the unavoidable absence, under very lamentable circumstances, of the Senator from Texas, who is a member of the subcommittee. But I told him that immediately upon the return of the Senator from Texas I hoped to be able to get the subcommittee together to consider the matter, and we would, without any delay, make a report.

But notwithstanding that assurance, notwithstanding the knowledge on the part of the Senator of the facts and circumstances to which I have referred, he brings the matter before the Senate this morning in a way that seems to involve criticism for nonaction on the part of the subcommittee.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator will allow me to disclaim any such purpose, for I expressly tried to have it understood that my sole object in bringing up the matter was to point out the fact that, if I understand the law, the men who have been contributing the funds of the national banks have broken the law, and therefore an investigation is necessary, not a mere bill to prohibit this crime in the future, but to go back and root out the facts in past cases and get at the men who have broken the law and punish them for it.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope I may be allowed to proceed until I have concluded. The Senator has not by his interruption added anything to what he said in his opening remarks. It is true in his opening remarks he made the point he now makes, and it is true he then read the statute under which he claims that an offense was committed, but having read the statute he announces in the most conclusive way that if contributions were made to campaign committees by national banks that statute has been violated. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss that, though I am going to call attention to what the statute does provide. I think the practice of national banks making contributions to political campaigns is a bad one. I think it ought to be prohibited, and I think they ought not to be allowed to do it. I think it is bad for insurance companies to make such contributions, and I am quite glad to join in any proper legislation that will break up all practices of that reprehensible character.

Now, it is true that when this matter was brought before the committee by the Senator, who appeared there in support of his bill, it was stated in the committee, if I may tell what occurred there without violating the rules of the Senate, that there was no doubt that national banks in 1896, when the question of the gold standard was before the country, had made contributions to the campaign committee, possibly to both campaign committees. I do not know about that. But it was stated anyway that they had made contributions to the Republican national campaign committee. I had no knowledge about it at that time; I have no knowledge now; but I have an idea, from what I have heard, that that is perhaps accurate. But it does not follow from that that under the statute an offense has been committed of the character mentioned by the Senator, for if he will read this statute carefully he will find that the provision is as I shall read it.

I do not read this in order to show they did not commit an offense. I do not care whether they did or did not, so far as this discussion is concerned. It is a matter to be considered in another connection. I am not interested in any national bank. I am not interested in protecting anybody. I have no desire to protect anybody. But I am interested in having a matter that concerns the integrity of the Senate and the dignity of the Senate properly presented to the Senate and to have it properly appear in the RECORD and before the country.

Section 5209, which the Senator read, provides as follows:

SEC. 5209. Every president, director, cashier, teller, clerk, or agent of any association, who embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, or credits of the association; or who, without authority from the directors, issues or puts in circulation any of the notes of the association; or who, without such authority, issues or puts forth any certificate of deposit, draws any order or bill of exchange, makes any acceptance, assigns any note, bond, draft, bill of exchange, mortgage, judgment, or decree; or who makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of the association, with intent, in either case, to injure or defraud the association or any other company, body politic or corporate, or any individual person, or to deceive any officer of the association, or any agent appointed to examine the affairs of any such association; and every person who with like intent aids or abets any officer, clerk, or agent in any violation of this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be imprisoned not less than five years nor more than ten.

Mr. President, you will see from a reading of the statute that the intent must have accompanied the act. The contribution must have been with intent to defraud, with intent to willfully misapply. It must have been without the knowledge and without the authority of the directors in order to bring it within the terms of the statute. Who knows from the mere statement that national banks made contributions to a campaign fund but that they were made with the knowledge not only of the directors, but with the knowledge also of the stockholders? Who will say that a contribution made by a national bank was for the purpose of defrauding or for the purpose of violating the law of the country? All those are legal questions which will arise upon an attempt to prosecute.

Now, I have no objection to the Senator having the fullest information it is possible to obtain, but it does not seem necessary, when we all agree that the practice is a bad one and that it should be prohibited by law, that we should wait upon an investigation in order to report upon this bill and pass it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from New Hampshire will have to bear me out now that the few minutes I was to consume——

Mr. FORAKER. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. TILLMAN. I only want to point out that the Senator's law is not good or that his interpretation of the law is not good, for this reason——

Mr. FORAKER. Can not the Senator do that in his own time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, no; he does not do that.

Mr. FORAKER. No; I will not decline. I was only trying to persuade the Senator to wait until I had made one other remark; just a sentence or two.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let me ask the Senator's attention to one point.

Mr. FORAKER. Very well.

Mr. TILLMAN. This statute provides that there must be no false entry. It happens that I introduced and the Senate passed a resolution requesting the Comptroller of the Currency to make inquiry on this very line, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury showed that, reaching back to 1892, as far as the records go, there were only one or two little, pitiable instances, involving $500 perhaps, in which this thing had been done. But I wanted an investigation by a committee, with power to send for persons and papers, in order to go back to the records and come on down if we should strike a hot trail, as I know we would, and show that either there have been false entries or the examiners have failed to do their duty; and it was with a view to having the law amended not only in this particular, so as to punish contributions, but to provide that it could not be done in the future.

Take the instance of the banks in the Senator's own city, where we have notice within the last week or two of the restitution by the treasurers of Hamilton County of some sixty or seventy thousand dollars. It has been returned by the treasurers to the county treasury. I do not know, but the report was that the money had been left by the agents of the banks with which the deposits were made lying around loose in envelopes; it just came out of the sky, so to speak. The fellow found it. Somehow or other he knew where it came from. It shows that there was collusion between him and the national banks.

Take the condition in Chicago, where the John R. Walsh bank went by the board with a powerful load of obligations hanging over it, and, as I understand, the national banks of Chicago, the associated banks, have assumed all of Mr. Walsh's debts and have taken his assets, and are acting as receivers, and all this in broad light of day, and nobody knows whether the stockholders and depositors of the banks who are going into this business are acting according to law or not, or whether the stockholders and the depositors are being protected or not. It only shows to me that there is need for a thorough search into all the transactions regarding all these things.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FORAKER. Has the Senator from South Carolina finished his question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FORAKER. I had the floor, as I understood, and I yielded to the Senator from South Carolina to ask a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] desires to interrupt the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to ask a question. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from South Carolina yielded the floor, I understand. If the Senator from Illinois wishes to say something, I will yield.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator from South Carolina was so obviously misinformed regarding the Chicago National Bank that I desired to correct him. But if it seems necessary I can do so at another time.

Mr. FORAKER. As I stated to the Senator from South Carolina before he interrupted me at such length. I have only one sentence or two to add, and then I will be through with all I desired to say.

The other point I desired to add was with respect to what the Senator from South Carolina said about Judge Humphreys. That could perhaps come better from the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] than it would from me. I have only a limited acquaintance with Judge Humphreys. I have met him once only, I believe, but I know his reputation, and I know he stands high as an honorable, upright, able, capable jurist, a judge in whom the people of the country may well have confidence, according to the information I have in regard to him.

But the word I wanted to say was not a word of defense of him, for I take it he needs none, but a word of suggestion to the Senator from South Carolina. I do not think it comes in very good grace from Senators here on the floor of this Chamber to be criticising those who are engaged in another department of the Government, as Judge Humphreys is, as to the manner in which they discharge their duties. He sat there as a judge to determine the rights of the parties who had been brought before him. It was his duty to determine those rights under his oath of office, according to his interpretation of the statutes that might be involved, which this Congress had passed when they were made laws. I have no question that he acted with absolute integrity in every sense of the word and with absolute impartiality. I believe that all the great judges of the Federal courts of this country, in so far as I have any personal knowledge of them, are incapable of acting in any other way.

Here is a decision of which the Senator from South Carolina does not seem to approve. It is his right to take exception in a proper way, but it does not seem to me that it is appropriate for us in this body to discuss such matters in such a way. Only a few weeks ago there were a number of decisions, coming one after another from the Supreme Court of the United States. There was the decision in the Chesapeake and Ohio and the New Haven coal case, and then the decision in the "Immunity cases," as they are called, and then the decision in the case that came up from the Senator's own State—South Carolina—all decisions with which the Senator must certainly have been very much gratified——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. As all other citizens of this country are gratified, because of the long step ahead which the court took in settling some of the most difficult questions with which we are beset to-day. But not one word of commendation have I heard from the Senator.

If he is to discuss every decision that is announced, it seems to me it would be in order for him now and then to take note of the fact that there is some progress being made by the courts along the line on which we are all anxious to see progress made. He should not confine himself to those decisions which do not seem at the time to entirely please him, certainly not when with him, as with the rest of us, it is perhaps true that he does not know just what the case was. I have not studied the case decided by Judge Humphreys. I am sure the Senator has not. I have confidence, however, that the judge who sat for weeks as presiding judge of the court, hearing all the testimony, examining all the law, hearing all the arguments that were made both pro and con, gave to it his best and an honest judgment, and whatever criticisms there may be of his action ought not to originate in this body. I do not think it is in keeping with the dignity of this body.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not like to speak thus plainly, but it seems to be necessary.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to remark that if the Senator had listened closely to my words, or if he will send to the stenographer and get a transcript of them, he will not feel warranted in asserting that I have adversely criticised Judge Humphreys. I know nothing about the case. I only know the result. I was particular—at least, I intended to be—to say that I know nothing about the facts, as to whether the judge had decided according to the law or not, but I was trying to give a kind of bird's-eye view of the situation in regard to this class of cases in which these instances in New York had attracted the attention of the country, of the district attorney and the judge being crosswise in their opinions as to the criminality of certain acts, and then going on to illustrate, by the condition in which we find ourselves in regard to the punishment of the pork packers, with the idea that it appears to be very probable, if not sure, that in the insurance frauds the big thieves will escape just as in the packing business the individuals are to escape.

I was animadverting or criticising or lamenting rather with my jaundiced vision the condition of the country; that we were in a bad way, and that we were very cautious, somehow or other, to take care of the corporations here while we were more or less indifferent as to the man. But when it came to punishing the men who run the corporations, then the corporations got it in the neck or got into trouble, while the men who ran the corporations got loose. That is what I was trying to bring out, and I was not criticising or abusing Judge Humphreys.

I want to say here and now that I have faith in the ability and patriotism and learning of the Supreme Court of the United States which every American ought to have, and I do not [illegible] that that court will ever declare that Congress is powerless to help the people and relieve them from this infamous condition which has been disclosed.

Mr. FORAKER. I am glad to hear the Senator say what he has just uttered, and I am particularly glad in view of the fact that within the last ten days—I think it was so recently as that the Senator said, in effect, that if the Supreme Court did not decide with respect to this question of the power of Congress to legislate as proposed the people would find a way to reform the Supreme Court.

Mr. TILLMAN. That was a warning, and I had a right to warn the court, even if I am a cornfield lawyer.

Mr. FORAKER. I happen to know, from letters I am receiving, that remarks of that kind have not a good effect upon the people of the country. They cause people to think that there is some lack of integrity somewhere connected with the administration of public affairs, either in the Congress of the United States to legislate or in the courts that decide. I think we ought not to contribute to that sort of feeling unless we believe there is ground for it; and if there is ground for it there ought to be an appropriate proceeding instituted to discover the facts and punish those who may have offended.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not care to have any more to say about it just now. I have my opinion; I have very strong convictions; I have those based on my view of the public welfare, and I certainly shall not hesitate to express my opinions here, although they may not conform to the ideas of propriety and good taste which govern my friend, the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. Did the Senator, after what I told him yesterday about the reason for nonaction on the part of the subcommittee, think that the public welfare required that he should parade the fact that we had not acted as he did in his remarks this morning on the floor of the Senate? Was there anything in the public interest that required it?

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator feels aggrieved because, having talked with him about this matter yesterday and knowing that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] was absent, I brought up this matter this morning, I hope he will let me say that it was not with any view or purpose or intention to cast any reflection upon him or any other member of the subcommittee, but it was to bring out the other phase of the question which leads to the necessity of an investigation; that is all. I hope the Senator will accept my apology now as to any purpose or intention of charging him directly or indirectly with any intention or any purpose of delaying action on that proposition.

Mr. FORAKER. There was no necessity for an apology to me, for I was not finding fault with the Senator because of anything he had said as to myself, for I take it that my explanation would be a sufficient answer if anyone thought I was being criticised. But I want to know, in view of the fact that the Senator has brought this matter out and just now said that he had spoken only with a view of promoting the public welfare, how he expected to promote the public welfare by saying that the subcommittee had not made a report when he knew it was impossible for us to have a meeting of the subcommittee unless we ignored the absence of the only member of the opposition on the subcommittee, who, as he knows, is unavoidably detained.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will feel that he has been attacked by insinuation or innuendo by my bringing it up, I can only disclaim any such purpose. I had no intention of impugning his integrity of purpose and honesty in dealing with this question.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand——

Mr. TILLMAN. I can not say any more.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand that; and, of course, what the Senator says is entirely satisfactory. What I was trying to say to him was that it was not necessary to say anything at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish I had not said it. Will that satisfy you?

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which this matter was referred, I think I owe it to the committee to make a simple statement of the facts.

On the 6th day of December the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] introduced a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for certain information in relation to contributions by national banks for campaign expenses. One of the inquiries in that resolution is the following:

> Sixth, whether the reports now on file made since said date show payments by any bank to any political committee or to any chairman, treasurer, or other officer of a political committee; and, sixth, whether such reports show any payments of the moneys of a bank to any person upon any voucher, or without any voucher, where the circumstances of the payments suggest that the money paid was to be used to carry on a political campaign or for any political purpose.

On the same day, December 6, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] introduced a resolution, as follows:

> Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be, and is hereby, directed to make inquiry and report to the Senate whether since March 4, 1893, any payments have been made by any national bank or banks to any political committee, or to the chairman, treasurer, or other officer of a political committee, or to carry on any political campaign, or for any political purpose; and said committee, if such payments have been made, is directed to report all the facts in detail to the Senate.

It will be observed that the resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain and report the facts was dated December 6, and the resolution directed to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to make inquiry on the subject bears the same date.

The Secretary of the Treasury made answer to the resolution on the 13th day of December, seven days later. Although the Senate is familiar with it, I will read a part of what the Secretary said:

> 5. While it is impossible to state positively whether any report shows any payments by any bank to any political committee or to any chairman, treasurer, or other officer of a political committee without an examination of each and every one of more than 100,000 reports on file of examinations made during the period covered by the resolution, to the best of my knowledge and belief such reports as have been made during my incumbency of the office of Comptroller, covering the period since October 1, 1901, do not show any payments of the nature indicated except in one or two instances, and these were in banks of the smaller capital class and for amounts not exceeding two or three hundred dollars.

After the report of the Secretary of the Treasury was received, in response to the resolution of December 6, and while the resolution directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to inquire into the same subject-matter was pending, I inquired of the Senator if the report of the Secretary of the Treasury upon this matter was deemed sufficient. The Senator then said very frankly it was not satisfactory to him; that he would want further inquiry, and then stated to me, not in detail the testimony expected to be adduced before the committee, but in a general way what possibly might be brought to light and proved. I then informed the Senator that if he would appear before the committee, state what he expected to prove, the evidence he had in support of his resolution, the committee would be very glad to take the matter up for consideration.

Subsequently a time was fixed when the Senator would appear before the committee and advise the committee of all the facts had within his knowledge bearing on his resolution. Before the meeting of the committee the Senator informed me that he was not certain he could appear before the committee on the day named, but would advise me later. I received a letter from the Senator, who was necessarily called from the Senate to his home in South Carolina, saying it would be impossible for him to be present at the meeting as agreed to. Upon the Senator's return I again called upon the Senator and asked him when he would be ready to come before the committee, and he again fixed a certain time—I do not now remember the day, but it was not more than three or four weeks ago, possibly three weeks ago. I then stated to the Senator I would call a meeting of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and we would be very glad to hear the Senator.

The meeting was called. I notified the Senator. It was a full committee practically. The Senator appeared and stated to the committee fully and frankly what his evidence was or what he expected to prove.

At the same time it should be stated that the Senator, on February 19, introduced a bill to prohibit national banks from contributing to campaign expenses. That bill was before the committee when the Senator made his statement. Of course the attention of the committee was called to the bill which he had introduced to remedy the evil complained of. It was the consensus of opinion of the members of the committee that the evil did exist. I think the Senator will bear me out in saying that I asked him if the object to be attained was not the correction of the evil, to which the Senator replied, of course that was the end to be reached.

Thereupon I appointed a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] to take into consideration the bill introduced by the Senator, and report to the full committee. As everyone knows, the Senator from Texas was called away upon a very painful occasion, and the other members of the committee have been busy, and there has been no opportunity for the subcommittee to give the measure proper consideration.

I will say to the Senator from South Carolina there is no disposition on the part of the Committee on Privileges and Elections or of the subcommittee to in any way suppress or postpone the matter, and as soon as the subcommittee can examine the bill it will be reported to the full committee, and no doubt receive prompt consideration.

I make this plain statement of the matter in justice to the committee over which I have the honor to preside.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan need not have taken the trouble to give the history of this matter; but, of course, he is to determine whether he thought it worth while or not. I want to say here and now what I tried to say this morning. I think you will find it in the report of the words I spoke that I said I was not reflecting on the committee; that I was not charging anybody with a disinclination to act or to delay; but that on these new developments brought out by the statement of Mr. Jerome, if the trustees of the insurance companies had committed a crime and were guilty of larceny, Messrs. Bliss and Cortelyou had been guilty of receiving stolen goods; and that this train of criminalty was more far-reaching that the mere gift by the trustees; and if that was true, while there is some doubt about it, as is shown by the division of opinion between the district attorney and the judge, here can be no doubt, in my judgment, about the malfeasance in office and the criminality of the national banks or any agent of any national bank who has contributed to a campaign fund, because the law expressly forbids it, as I understand the law.

That being true, I felt that with the knowledge which I have of $17,000, in one second or third class city, having been contributed from the funds of national banks toward a campaign fund, and I got from a reliable source that $70,000 was contributed in Chicago, and as that seemed to be a general policy pursued by all the banks, it appeared to me that there must be a million or a million and a half dollars of this kind of money that had been misappropriated. I do not like to say stolen, but it has been taken from the funds of the banks, and it has gone into the coffers of the campaign committee.

I thought an investigation ought to be had, so that those who have been guilty of breaking the law could be made at least to refund, if prosecution had gone by, under the statute of limitations, so that they can not be indicted. If we get the legislation we will get it much more rapidly, much more effectively, by the course I suggest. This is no reflection upon the Senate, because I think the Senate will pass this bill, but they are practicing how not to investigate over in the House on this very line, if I may speak of a coordinate branch of the Government without being again called to book by the Senator from Ohio. We have no assurance that even if the bill is reported favorably by the Senator from Michigan or by the subcommittee and the full committee and if it passes here that it will pass the other end. I want some ventilation of this subject. I want some light. I want the country to know that the beef packers and insurance people are not the only rascals who are floating around. I should like to run down every one of them if we can. Let us all join in legislating here so that they will not get loose the next time they are caught. That is my purpose. I had no desire to reflect on the committee or the subcommittee.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the House is not just now investigating the subject he refers to, but the House has been investigating it, and on last Saturday the House made a report from its Judiciary Committee, through the chairman of that committee, a very able report on this very subject, as to what extent Congress has power to visit corporations that are organized under State laws. I commend it to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator say that the national banks are organized under State law?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly not.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then to what does the opinion of the Judiciary Committee apply?

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator always interrupts before he gives me time to say anything. The Senator's bill applies to national banks, and it also applies to all carriers that are engaged in interstate commerce, without regard to the fact that most of them, perhaps all of them, are incorporated under the State laws.

Mr. KEAN. And it applies also to all other corporations.

Mr. FORAKER. It applies also, I believe, to all other corporations. Therefore, no matter what they are doing——

Mr. TILLMAN. I was trying to sweep with a clean broom.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not rise to discuss the report of the House, but only to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the House has already, through its committee, made a report. I took it home with me last evening and looked over it. It is a very able document, and it is signed by every Democrat who is a member of that committee, as well as by the Republicans.

Mr. TILLMAN. I had out of my cornfield law expressed an opinion here in the early days of the session that it was outside of the jurisdiction of Congress to undertake to control insurance companies. I am not a lawyer and I do not pretend to be, I have just some general ideas of this great science and some little concrete propositions of law in my head. I depend on common sense a great deal more than I do on any other factor in judging this question.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the further fact that the same committee, through its very able chairman, has reported separately on the question of insurance corporations. There are two reports. They are both well worth the Senator's perusal.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am too well grounded in State rights to need anything of that sort coming from any committee. But the Senator still does not deny that the national banks are national corporations and are peculiarly under the jurisdiction of Congress.

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, certainly.

Mr. President, I did not rise to take any issue with the Senator, but only to give him the information that the investigation to which he referred had been conducted, so far as the committee had been conducting it, and that the committee has made two reports, both of them very full.

PRESERVATION OF NIAGARA FALLS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit to you herewith the report of the American members of the International Waterways Commission regarding the preservation of Niagara Falls. I also submit to you certain letters from the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War, including memoranda showing what has been attempted by the Department of State in the effort to secure the preservation of the falls by treaty.

I earnestly recommend that Congress enact into law the suggestions of the American members of the International Waterways Commission for the preservation of Niagara Falls without waiting for the negotiation of a treaty. The law can be put in such form that it will lapse, say in three years, provided that during that time no international agreement has been reached. But in any event I hope that this action will make it evident that it is doing all in its power to preserve the great scenic wonder, the existence of which, unharmed, should be a matter of pride to every dweller on this continent.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 27, 1906.

REORGANIZATION OF THE CONSULAR SERVICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] desires to be relieved from service as conferee on the bill (S. 1345) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States. The Chair appoints in the place of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

H. R. 5972. An act granting the right to sell burial sites in parts of certain streets in Washington City to the vestry of Washington parish for the benefit of the Congressional Cemetery;

H. R. 9329. An act to amend an act approved February 28, 1903, entitled "An act to provide for a Union Station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;"

H. R. 14578. An act to provide for the establishment of a public crematorium in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

H. R. 15740. An act amending an act entitled "An act for the extension of M street east of Bladensburg road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1905;

H. R. 16484. An act to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901; and

H. R. 16140. An act authorizing the maintaining and operating for toll an existing structure across Tugaloo River, known as "Knox's Bridge," at a point where said river is the boundary between the States of South Carolina and Georgia.

H. R. 15435. An act to empower the Secretary of War to convey to the city of Minneapolis certain lands in exchange for other lands, to be used for flowage purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

H. J. Res. 11. Joint resolution for the publication of eulogies delivered in Congress on Hon. John W. Cranford, late a Representative in Congress, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. CLAPP. I had intended this morning to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 5976. I understand that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is going to speak on the rate bill at 2 o'clock, and at the conclusion of his speech I will ask the Senate to consider the report.

Mr. CLAPP subsequently said: At the request of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], I will let the report on House bill 5976 go over until to-morrow morning.

YELLOWSTONE RIVER BRIDGE IN MONTANA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5204) to authorize the construction of a bridge or bridges across the Yellowstone River in Montana.

The amendments were, on page 3, line 13, to strike out the words "two years" and insert "one year;" and on page 3, line 13, to strike out "four years" and insert "three years."

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

SNAKE RIVER BRIDGE, NEAR LEWISTON, IDAHO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5211) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Snake River at or near Lewiston, Idaho, which were, on page 4, line 2, to strike out "two years" and insert "one year;" and on page 4, line 2, to strike out "four years" and insert "three years."

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. As it is just two minutes before 2 o'clock, I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, yesterday evening it was suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], whose long experience and judgment in regard to these matters I have learned to have great respect for, that I should propose this morning a unanimous-consent agreement in regard to voting on the rate bill. I want to say that, while I am not disposed to press this matter unduly or to have the appearance of dragooning anything or anybody and desire every Senator to have the fullest opportunity to speak, I would like if we could come to some understanding in regard to a day when we can have a final vote upon the bill.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator considered what I think ought to be a part of the proposition in fixing a time——

Mr. TILLMAN. I will read what I have prepared, so that the Senator will understand what I have thought, under the enlightening disussion yesterday afternoon, would be a desirable and advantageous method of dealing with it when we do come to it.

Mr. HALE. I wish the Senator would read it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maine or to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will yield to either Senator or to both Senators.

Mr. HALE. While I am on the floor, I will yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was about to say that it seems to me even an attempt at an agreement is decidedly premature at this moment. The Senator from South Carolina is quite aware that there is no disposition on any side to extend the discussion beyond reasonable limits. Several very important speeches are to be made this week. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who has two very important amendments pending, and who takes a great interest in this whole question, will be unavoidably absent from the Senate for a number of days yet, and until his return certainly we can not even approach an agreement. So it seems to me that it would be most desirable to wait for a few days until some of these important speeches are to be made before even any details of a suggested agreement are made. I shall feel obliged at this moment to object to any agreement of any kind.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, I had not anticipated getting an agreement the first time or the second time. I rose this morning merely for the purpose of suggesting the desirability of some date, and I did that more under the advice and counsel of my distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] and of his colleague from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], both of whom have had so long and honorable experience here and whose judgment and skill in handling this kind of thing every man must acknowledge and look up to. I would not have presumed to undertake to press the matter at all but for the fact that I had been rather asked to do it.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator is all right. The process of bringing the Senate to a conclusion upon any matter is a gradual process. I think the Senator is moving in the right direction in calling attention to the fact that some day we have got to agree, which is the manner of the Senate—the rule, I will say, of the Senate—upon a time. I should like to have read what the Senator has already brought out in his mind, covering the suggestion of the last few days being devoted to a ten minutes' debate on different amendments.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator desires it, I will read what I have prepared here.

Mr. HALE. I would be glad to hear it, because that will go into the RECORD.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on such a day and such a date, 1906, and the following days, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business the Senate will proceed with the bill H. R. 12987, an act, etc., the debate to proceed under the ten-minute rule; that amendments may be offered and may be disposed of by a vote during this five days' period at the pleasure of the Senate, and that on such and such a date following, at 2 o'clock p. m., the Senate will begin voting on the amendments that have not been disposed of up to that day and that may then be pending or which may be offered, and that a vote shall be taken on the bill itself before adjournment.

I thought I would try to cover the various good suggestions that were made yesterday evening in the absence of the Senator from Rhode Island as to the advisability and desirability of having the fullest possible opportunity to discuss amendments, which we have not been doing heretofore on some other measures, as must appear to him evident.

Mr. HALE. The two things will go together. When we agree upon a date for the final vote to end the discussion and consideration in the Senate, we ought at the same time, and I have no doubt will, agree to a provision something in the line of that suggested by the Senator. It seems to me that he has covered it quite well. We shall agree upon the two things, and then the Senate will be in a position not only to listen to the general discussion, but at a time fixed to proceed to the consideration of the amendments.

I am glad to see that the Senator in framing this provision has left the question as to the time to be consumed by particular amendments to the discretion of the Senate. We could not say in terms that each amendment shall have so much time, because some amendments are of much more account than others and need more time. But if we fix the number of days, five or six days, it is then at the discretion of the Senate during that time to limit the debate on an amendment to five speeches or ten speeches, or if it is a more important and critical amendment the Senate in its discretion may give it more time. I think the Senator has been wise in leaving that discretion. As to the form that the agreement will take, that can be finally considered when we agree upon a time and when we will also agree upon the process. I think the Senator has hurried the matter along by preparing this suggestion.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not know whether this is intended to cut off the adoption of amendments previous to the period of five days. If so, I shall want to object to it. I think we ought to take up some of the amendments that are important and take a vote on them and dispose of them.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think there is no proposition now to have it agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I do not make it as a proposition to be agreed to. I would not have brought it out but for the fact that the Senator from Maine asked to have it read.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to suggest to the Senator that I want an opportunity to vote on one or two of these amendments. Whether I want to make a speech or not will depend somewhat upon whether a particular amendment is adopted or not. What I want to say on it may depend upon whether the amendment is adopted. So I do not want to be cut off and prevented on to-morrow, if that is a proper time, from action on a certain amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. To-morrow?

Mr. TELLER. To-morrow or any other day.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to explain why I think that would be unwise and unfair?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is for this reason: Senators are now engaged in preparing speeches, and it takes a great deal of research, as I happen to know from experience, to even touch this great question in high places. There are so many ramifications of it, and it is so vastly important that any man who approaches it without getting acquainted with the great amount of labor involved is showing very little knowledge of the situation.

Senators who are preparing speeches want to be heard and also want to vote on amendments. I do not think it would be altogether good policy or fair, either, to such Senators to say that to-morrow we will take up a given amendment and press it to a conclusion. I would judge that that would mean the death of that amendment on general principles, however meritorious it might be.

I thought that the best course to follow would be to let any and every body who wants to speak speak on the general subject or speak on a given amendment and ventilate it in the fullest possible way; and when we get ready to do business, as the phrase is, we have notice given to every Senator that upon a certain day the Senate is going to begin the active work of framing this bill, inserting amendments and taking out words if they want to, and completing it. Therefore I think it would be unwise to undertake to begin to amend it until the time that may be agreed on, say five days ahead of the time for a final vote. If any Senator during those five days feels called on to speak longer than ten minutes, I am sure the Senate has never yet, since I have been in it, objected to having such a Senator continue, unless he was exceedingly dull and uninteresting. Sometimes I have seen Senators notified by the presiding officer that the time was out and nobody moved to extend it, but ordinarily any Senator who has got anything to say can always get a hearing here, thank God.

Mr. TELLER. I do not remember ever to have seen a unanimous-consent agreement of this kind changed by allowing a Senator to go on, except on a few occasions when I think the presiding officer has been oblivious of the fact that the time had arrived for quitting. In such a case nobody has ever found any fault, but I have never heard anyone ask for an agreement that we might proceed further than the allotted time. I do not suppose that will be done.

Mr. President, all I am trying to get at is not that we shall take up a case and press it, but that when the Senate is ready to vote on a proposition we shall not be stopped by the Chair saying to the Senate, as we heard on the statehood bill and several others, "It is not in order to vote on this amendment until a certain time." I want to say to the Senator that that will be the arrangement anyway, whether he agrees to it or not.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not my agreement; it is the Senate's agreement, and if any Senator will read this——

Mr. TELLER. As a member of the Senate, I mean to reserve the right of the Senate to vote on it, not to press it unduly, and if Senators want to have their votes recorded they can be here. That is all there is about it.

Mr. TILLMAN. During those five days?

Mr. TELLER. During the time between now and the beginning of the five days.

Mr. TILLMAN. Between this and the five days?

Mr. TELLER. Yes; between this time and the five days. If some amendment should be presented and adopted, there would be a necessity for further amendments, and further amendments would not be necessary unless that amendment was adopted. If some amendments that are offered should be rejected, then there might be a necessity for some amendments that otherwise would not exist.

But what I want to obtain has always been the rule of the Senate, that Senators will have a right to a vote on an amendment at the proper time and have it determined. What I want is that when we come to a time to conclude debate that the agreement to do so shall be irrevocable, and that we shall live up to it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I suppose on this general understanding that we shall proceed as the Senate has done for years—that during general debate if a point is reached when the Senate is ready to vote on a proposition or on an amendment it shall do so. In that way one consideration and one point after another is eliminated; and I do not suppose that anything we do now will interfere with that. But that at some time in the future there is a necessity for a time being agreed upon for the consideration of all remaining amendments not disposed of, I think must be clear to every Senator's mind. In the meantime, however, if there is any amendment in the consideration of any bill that has ever been considered since I have been a member of the Senate, when we come to the point of a vote, we vote on that, and that is eliminated from the final consideration. It is not contemplated that every amendment that is offered shall go over. We may vote upon any amendment after we have reached it and concluded discussion upon it; but finally a time should be fixed for the remaining amendments to be considered.

I agree with the Senator that if the Senate decides beforehand to vote upon any particular amendment, it has the power to do so, and nobody can take that power away.

Mr. TELLER. It can not be taken away legally, unless we shall agree to it.

Mr. HALE. I do not understand that it can be.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not asked for any agreement at all, because the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] very clearly indicated that he was not now ready to consider one, and gave a good reason why. This is a mere tentative suggestion, which will probably be amended to suit the Senator from Colorado and other Senators who may have special reasons for wanting some slight change in the phraseology; and until it is agreed to, the Senate will act under its general rules.

Mr. HALE. Precisely.

Mr. TILLMAN. And do as it pleases and do as it has done with everything before it.

Mr. HALE. I so understand.

Mr. TELLER. I was moved to make this suggestion by the fact that we had what I think was an unusual agreement with reference to the statehood bill. I was surprised when it was announced that no vote was in order until 4 o'clock on the day of the disposition of that bill, although that statement was strictly correct under the agreement, as I found when I examined it. I wish to avoid a repetition of that. If we want a vote at any time during the last four or five days on any amendment we shall have it, and that we shall stand by that agreement.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, Senate resolution No. 86, being a resolution introduced by me on the 26th day of February of this year, is a brief synopsis of the points I desire to make in my argument upon the rate bill; and as it contains at least one or two features which I shall ask to be incorporated in an amendment to that bill, I am desirous to make that resolution a part of my remarks, and will ask the Secretary to read it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the "act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and acts amendatory and supplementary thereto, should be amended as to provide:

First. That the provisions of said act shall be so extended as to cover and include all rates and charges for transfer or switching, and apply to all terminal or other facilities for receiving, handling, and shipping goods, wares, and merchandise, and shall prohibit any and all unjust charges or discrimination in relation thereto.

Second. That if it be established that any railroad company has granted or paid, directly or indirectly, by or through any means or device whatever, any rebate or preference to any shipper, that both such railroad and said shipper shall be adjudged to pay a fine of three times the amount of such rebate or the value of such preference granted or received, in addition to any other fine or penalty now provided in said act.

Third. That all refrigerator cars or cold-storage cars or other cars, whether owned by any railway company or by any other person or corporation, used in interstate commerce, shall be covered by the provisions of said act.

Fourth. That all charges paid by any railroad company for use or rental of any such cars shall be just and reasonable to the end that the owner of such cars using the same for shipment of his own goods shall no unfair or unjust benefit over any other shipper of like goods; all unjust and unreasonable charges by the owners of such cars use or rental thereof to any railway company or for use or thereof by any other shippers or for ieing or other service in ction with the use thereof shall be prohibited.

Fifth. That on and after January 1, 1909, every railroad company an interstate-commerce business shall furnish all cars, whether erator, cold-storage, or other specially constructed or designed for the carriage of special merchandise, necessary for the con- of its business as a common carrier, and shall furnish at just and nable rates all ieing and other service necessary or proper for the tion of any goods in transit; and on and after such date no such d company shall enter into any contract with the owner or ship- any goods to ship the same in the cars of such owner or shipper any rental for such cars.

Sixth. That all discrimination in rates or service between persons ving from one point to another point shall be strictly prohibited; ch provision shall not prevent any railroad company from making special rates to or from any locality as it may deem necessary for development of such locality or enterprise therein, as may seem to the interest of such locality, business, or the railroad serving the Seventh. That the said Interstate Commerce Commission shall be pro- ited from making any rules or regulations or adjusting any rates the of which shall in any respect prevent or discourage free and full petition between the several carrying lines of the country.

Eighth. That such Interstate Commerce Commission shall make no or regulation having for its object the distribution of the carrying transportation business of the country between any particular carry- lines or between any particular cities; but that all such carrying or transportation of goods shall be allowed to go to such road ads or through such city or cities as shall be able under free and restricted competition to secure the same.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that resolution in a very few words and in a general way expresses my own convictions and my own personal views as to the scope and the breadth of any law that should be proposed for the government of inter-state commerce. It is more drastic in some respects than the bill which has been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce. It is drastic in those provisions which are intended to meet drastic conditions, such as rebates, discriminations, private-car offenses, and the like. On the other hand, Mr. President, it would liberalize the present law in respect of special rates designed to develop either a new country or a new industry. It would allow, under proper safeguards and restrictions, special rates for those smaller and weaker industries and localities for the very purpose of developing them to such a condition that they could break the monopoly of the great trusts and corporations and give the public the benefit of honest competition.

It does not contain any provision about changing the rate-making power from the managers of the railways to a political board, for the reason, Mr. President, that, in my humble judgment, such a provision will not in the slightest degree tend to affect rebates in any way, shape, or manner, or any of the other evils of which we are complaining, but would, on the contrary, be injurious to the public.

Why? First, Mr. President, because it would destroy that elasticity so necessary for building up the interior of the country and building up any new industries; second, it would destroy to a very considerable degree the little competition that now exists between the great carrying lines; and, third, it would lead directly to government ownership of railways in a very short time; and I think that we would all deprecate a condition of that character. A provision, Mr. President, which is very doubtful of good results and very certain of bad results, in my judgment, ought not to be made the law of the country.

Mr. President, I believe that this bill substantially as reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce will pass this body, that it will be concurred in by the other House, be signed by the President, and become the law of the land. Then what? The worst disappointment that has ever befallen a really interested and expectant people. Why? Because the bill itself in beginning to end in its entire scope is not a bill that can possibly reach at the real things that the people are actually complaining of; secondly, because there is not a single provision aimed at a single one of the real injustices or the evils complained of that is not already a law; and the only other important provision is one which does not remedy any existing evil, but, in my opinion, will result in incalculable injury to the whole country.

Mr. President, the press of the country, with more zeal than logic, has for more than a year persistently, in season and out of season, insisted that all of our transportation evils and all of the evils which are back of these transportation offenses are awaiting only this panacea of Interstate Commerce Commission rate-making power in order to be entirely eradicated. In this the people are being deceived, and as surely as the sun shall rise to-morrow they will awaken soon to a realization of that deception. Worse than this, Mr. President, they will awaken to a realization of the fact that rates which heretofore have rapidly, and in many instances marvelously, declined will in the future become stationary or go even higher; that rates which heretofore have been sufficiently flexible to adapt themselves to the commercial and industrial exigencies of the country will hereafter become rigid and unyielding; that the great interior of the country, with its thousands of little cities which have flourished and grown independent, will in the future become more and more subservient to a few of the great seaboard towns of the country; and that the competition which has played, heretofore at least, some part in the matter of lowering and maintaining lower rates will hereafter lie dormant. They will awaken, Mr. President, to a realization of the real reason for the utter and absolute complacency of all the great trusts in the country, which are the prime causes of all our transportation evils, and of a thousand other wrongs against the public; and, Mr. President, there will be some reaction, in my opinion, when they find that not a single one of these great trusts has been in the slightest degree affected.

It is impossible to properly consider any legislation proposed to remedy offenses in railroad rate making without investigating the causes which lead to such offenses, causes which not only invite them, but, in very many instances, force them upon unyielding railways.

Mr. President, industrial and commercial America of to-day is not the industrial or commercial America of thirty years ago. Remedies which might have been successfully applied to conditions of thirty years ago have absolutely no potency when applied to the new conditions of to-day; and, Mr. President, the sooner we wake up to this truth and open our eyes to a full realization as to where our industrial course has brought us, the sooner we stop temporizing and avoiding the real issue and face the foe, intrenched though he may be in seemingly impregnable positions, the better will it be for the people and for Congress. We may as well understand now where we are at and what we are up against, industrially and commercially, and then, if we have any remedy for the evils which flow from these changed conditions, let us apply that remedy.

Mr. President, in all the great crises in the world's history, whenever the critical time has arisen which was to determine the survival of the fittest, whether in physical, political, or industrial evolution, the inexorable law of nature has never given but one alternative, destruction or adaptation. Destroy the opposing conditions or submit and adapt yourself to them. That is as much the law to-day as it has been any time in the history of the world.

There is a most extreme nervous tension over this whole country and over the world at large which is ominous, a nervous tension verging almost on hysteria, if we can take the press as a standard. This is not because of the little dissatisfaction that grows out of rate making or the complaints that are made by shippers. It has a broader and a wider significance than that. These are only evidences of this world-wide restlessness. It can only be compared, it seems to me, with that tense strain of public sentiment in this country which followed the election of Mr. Lincoln and continued up to the very beginning of the civil war.

What is this crisis? It is the struggle for supremacy between individualism on the one hand and combination on the other; between the unit individually and the unit collectively; between great corporate interests and opportunities and individual interests and opportunities. These two conditions are now coming in such sharp contact with each other that one or the other will ultimately be supreme. The people are realizing which one of these conditions is rapidly gaining the ascendancy, and, as Americans, with their inherited ideas of independence, they are not disposed to surrender this individual opportunity, with its fairer hopes, with its loftier ambitions, with its fairer aspirations, without most earnest and desperate opposition.

Mr. President, this is the people's battle. This is what is absorbing the interest of the public, awakening distrust, creating an antagonism and uncertain apprehension. The mere changing of the rate-making power of railroads from manager to board, even though it produce all that its most ardent advocates could possibly dare to claim, would be infinitesimal in its influence upon the final result of this contest. Destruction or adaptation is the issue. We must accomplish the one or accept the other.

What is our present industrial situation? Why is the temper of the people becoming so acute? What are the complaints that are made to-day and to which we ought, in justice, to listen? The great industrial concerns of the country, which, by reason of their power, their wealth, their economy, are able to control, and are controlling more and more, the principal branches of industry, and which, while enriching themselves often with marvelous rapidity, are able to strike down competition wherever it may raise its head—these are the causes of this great unrest and uncertainty, amounting to extreme hostility in very many instances. These great corporations enjoy natural advantages irrespective of any carrying privileges through the railways themselves. These advantages are mostly of an economic nature, wholly independent of special privileges. There is the economy in the great packing houses where not a hair, not a drop of blood, not a hoof, nor a horn, nor a bone, nor an organ, nor its contents are wasted; the economy in our great manufacturing industries, where not a single stroke of the hammer, not a turn of the wrist, not a contraction of a muscle, but is turned to profitable account; advantages in vast credit and ability to control other industries which might otherwise be antagonistic; alliances, both offensive and defensive between each and all of such industrial corporations, whereby the one secures from the other either actual aid or assurance of non-interference while it deals with its smaller adversary. These advantages are wholly independent of special carrying privileges. To compete against such advantages, the smaller concerns must have the special rates. Were it in my power I would give it to them. I certainly would not prevent a railroad from giving such special or preferential rates as would enable them to compete with the greater concerns. Against such a wall of economic advantages, competition may hurl itself in vain. Its defeat is assured.

If a rival arises of such importance as to challenge serious consideration, it is found to be to the mutual advantage of both to unite into a still greater concern and monopolize to a still greater extent the markets of the country.

And so it is that the average American finds that the field of individual opportunity for the man of moderate means to build up an industry which he may with assurance develop and transmit to his children, is becoming more and more limited and supplanted by the great corporation, and he can either go to the wall, eke out a mere existence, or accept a clerkship, or become the manager of a department in the larger concern.

If this average American goes into the open market to purchase the necessaries of life, he finds but the dying embers of competition. The meat trust has fixed a month beforehand just what he shall pay for his steak or ham or bacon. The leather trust has determined the price of his shoes and his harnesses. The hat and clothing manufacturers have made an arrangement with each other and with the retail merchant as to the unalterable price for the retail of their respective wares, and the merchant who varies a farthing loses his business. The sugar trust, measuring with scrupulous ability his means to pay, fixes the price of his sugar each day. The oil magnates have a mortgage for a definite amount of his earnings if he indulges in the luxury of light. If he travels he falls into the clutches of the hotel trust. If he wants a home he finds a combination on all available building lots. If he has sufficient wealth to pass this barrier and contract to build, he has fallen into the grasp of a greater trust—the labor trust—whose iron rules forbid more than eight hours for a day's labor, or more than one-half of the laborers' ability during those eight hours. If he desires amusement he is met with the theater trust, and the business man, though his earnings may be fair, is forced to live in a stall. The trusts see to it that he has no surplus at the end of the year.

And so, Mr. President, go where he will, he finds himself corralled by this great wall of trusts upon every side. He sees his opportunity cut off completely, and do we wonder that his mind has got into a condition where it is in a very receptive mood to seize with alacrity and with a ravenous appetite anything he thinks will throttle these great corporate interests?

I was very much interested a year or two ago in the most eloquent address—I might almost call it lecture—made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] on the future possibilities of the young men of energy. He depicted in the most glowing terms, as he always does, the possibilities of every young man who has brain and the energy to go to work to accomplish something for himself. His rhetoric was beautiful, because no matter what the Senator from Iowa may say his wildest fancies always fly on painted wings. He gave us an example of the Studebaker Wagon Company. He depicted an old man who a few years ago in his blacksmith shop hammered day after day while the sparks flew from his sturdy strokes. He followed him up the ladder of prominence until he had some 30,000 people under him, and the Senator gave that as one of the glories and opportunities for the young man of to-day.

Ah, Mr. President, if we should take that Mr. Studebaker and put him in his same old blacksmith shop to-day, hammering with the same energy which he did in those days in which there was opportunity, we would find that he would never get out of that blacksmith shop. The Studebaker of to-day, the young Studebaker, would put a wagon down in front of his shop for one-third what the old man could make it for.

These are the conditions that the people are complaining against, and bitterly complaining against, and if we can help them in any way I certainly would be one who would be very glad to do it. So I feel that we are diverting this hostile sentiment from its real cause—the great combinations and the great trusts—and we are directing it, fanned by the press into a flame, along certain channels. The sugar trust is far in the distance. The meat trust is somewhere, but we can not reach it. The railways, however, reach into every town and every section of the country, and we see them constantly before us, and it is very much easier to turn the attention of the public to and the animosity of the public against that which they can see them against that which they feel but can not see. So I feel that we are using this sentiment of public indignation, of public animosity, and we are directing it in such a way that it will in the end be detrimental and not beneficial to the very people whose interests we are attempting to subserve.

The real root of the evil which is challenging the serious consideration of the public and creating this animosity which in the end will force paternalism upon the Government is the trustification or combination of the industries of the country. And as I have said before, we can not deal intelligently with railroad rates independent of the great corporations, which every day fix the price of the people's commodities for the next day, and even coerce the great railway systems into rebates and other unlawful devices. What will it avail the public even if in a given case a product is shipped 1 cent per pound cheaper from Chicago to New York if half a dozen men who own all of such commodity or control it still continue the old price?

Now, what the people really want is this: They want a law that will break every one of these great industrial concerns into a thousand different pieces. Then they want another law that will prevent them from ever combining again; and they want another law that will prevent any one of them gaining such ascendency or growing to such an extent that it will be able again to monopolize the business of the country. And if the Senator from South Carolina, or any other Senator, can conceive of any plan whereby we can constitutionally reach that condition, he will go down in history as the greatest benefactor of the human race. I have myself found no way, but I know that those are the conditions with which we are dealing and they are the conditions about which the people are complaining.

Mr. President, there are other forces that are working more and more toward the aggrandizement, toward increasing the size and importance and the influence, of these great industrial concerns more insidious than the others I have mentioned, simply because no one yet has suggested any remedy for them. I refer to our banking system, to our great fire and life insurance companies, to the savings banks, to our great trust companies.

Our national banking system has been one of the greatest blessings this country has ever enjoyed. It has been able to keep a stable currency, which must be the basis of all industrial progress and prosperity. Our great life and fire insurance companies have likewise been of inestimable value to the American people. Our savings banks and our trust companies, investing the savings of men of small means, have also been of great benefit. But all of these working together have carried within them a seed which under favorable conditions has grown and developed and brought forth its train of evils.

Mr. President, the great increase in the gold production of the United States in the last ten years, the mighty balances of trade, averaging $400,000,000 in our favor during the last ten years, have given us a quantity of available cash and currency beyond anything that the country has ever known before.

The savings of the people—for despite the fact that they are trust ridden it is a matter of fact that during these prosperous times their savings have been greater than ever before—have poured billions into these receptacles, and thereby subjected enormous sums of money to the control of comparatively few persons. These immense sums of money have been invested, they have been used for speculative purposes in making and breaking markets and have been manipulated to such an extent that they have made vast fortunes for comparatively few people, and those vast sums of money, looking for investment, go back again to those same industries and increase their power and thereby decrease the opportunity for the smaller individual industry.

This, Mr. President, is creating an intense animosity, an animosity which if not checked, I believe, will in the end force this Government more and more into the field of paternalism. I am not raising my voice against the accumulation of great fortunes by honest means, such as grow naturally from the development of any business. The great inventors, such as Edison, have been worth hundreds of millions of dollars to this country, and they are well worthy the millions which perhaps they have saved. So, too, a man may project a railway into a new country, and by the marvelous development of that country possibly become many times a millionaire, but in doing so he has made it possible for hundreds of thousands of people to become rich, to have the comforts and blessings of life; and while he has made one million he has made it possible for the people to make a thousand millions. The field of opportunity should always be open to men of that class. They have been one of the greatest blessings to the human race.

But what the American people object to, and what they have a right to object to, is the vast sums that are being made by their owners, by speculation and manipulation, and which sums, going into the already immense industrial combinations, advance their power and control, and, of course, thereby diminish the field of opportunity for smaller business interests. They object, and they have a right to object, to the great increase in the number of nonproducers as compared with the producing population of the country, for the former must always either directly or indirectly live upon the latter.

This, Mr. President, is a very brief statement of the conditions as they exist to-day. We are rapidly passing through an evolutionary stage which in compacting the mass is destroying the individual, and not without serious complaint on the part of the latter, and to my mind a very just complaint. It does not answer this to say, as has often been said, that there is opportunity for development and opportunity for advancement within the limits of these great concerns. This does not answer human aspirations. The ambition of every father is not that his son shall be a high-salaried clerk, not that he shall simply be an overseer or the head of a department, but that he shall be the head of his own business, with a field of opportunity in which may be broadly developed both the individual and the man; and nothing short of that is going to satisfy human ambition.

Mr. President, these are the conditions the people are crying against. How are you answering their complaint? If you say that the new provision in the rate bill, the only important provision which is not now the law—that of changing the rate-making power from the managers to a political board—will accomplish anything in changing those conditons; if you are luring the public into the belief that this provision will answer their prayer, then certainly the Senator from South Carolina spoke with inspired wisdom when he said that this bill was one of the greatest farces ever perpetrated on the public. Of course he said this before he knew that he was to become the stepfather of this same bill.

There is a false supposition that this will be a new law affecting rebates, but as a matter of truth it does not add one syllable to the old law upon rebates. In my opinion that law is insufficient, as it now stands, and it ought to be modified. Why? Because it does not strike with sufficient and effective force the principal party to the rebate transaction. To be sure it provides for a fine of $5,000, we will say, but that may be a mere bagatelle as compared with the entire amount which may be received by one of these great concerns in rebates during a year. If the meat trust or any other one of these trusts which are wringing these rebates out of the railways receive $200,000 in a single year, and if at the end of the year you require it to pay back $600,000 in fines, the next year, so far as that company is concerned, rebates will have become a matter of past history.

The resolution which I offered follows the recommendation of the President, that both the giver and the taker of a rebate should pay a penalty equivalent to three times the amount of the rebate. Why has this recommendation, the strongest and most potent remedy in abating this abominable practice, been ruthlessly thrust aside? Why have we abandoned the most effective weapon we have in our warfare against this evil while we substitute therefor a provision merely granting the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix maximum rates, which no one has had the temerity to assert on this floor would in the slightest degree affect the rebate business, because anyone must know that it is just as easy for a railway company or a trust of any kind to avoid a rate that is made by the Commission as a rate made by the proper board of managers themselves?

Mr. President, it has been shown that a reduction of 1½ mills per ton per mile in the aggregate would prohibit any railway company from paying any dividend; that another reduction of 1½ mills in the aggregate would prevent them paying one dollar upon their bonded indebtedness. I cite these facts for the purpose of showing how sensitive every great carrying line must be to any loss of its business. Now, we will suppose that the beef trust, which controls the greater part of the shipments of beef from Kansas City or Omaha or Chicago, or the sugar trust, which practically controls all shipments of sugar in the country, or the oil trust, which controls practically all the oil shipped back and forth in the country, says to the railways, "I control all of the shipments of meat," or "oil" or "sugar," as the case may be. "Not only this, but my business is so related and correlated with all the other great concerns of the country that I can turn one-quarter of your business into other channels. I want to destroy my competitor, and I want you to give me a rebate or such other privilege as will enable me to drive him out of the market; and if you do not do it, I will turn this business another way and drive you into bankruptcy."

The freight agent is responsible entirely for the success of his road. The real earnings come from the freight rather than from the passenger traffic. The very existence of that line will depend upon his not losing any particular portion of that business, and he is thereby forced into giving this rebate in order to save his own business. It seems to me that inasmuch as the great industrial concern is the real party in interest, the real party who has driven the railway into this act, it should be the principal party against whom the law should be aimed, simply because they are enabled in that way, first, to destroy the smaller competitors, and as soon as they have done this then to raise their prices again to such an amount as is possible and at the same time not have a serious diminution in their sales.

I will give but a single example: For the last four years the price of cattle on our western plains has been gradually declining. For the same number of years the cost of converting those cattle into meat has also slightly declined. During the same years the price of the finished product as it comes to our tables has very enormously advanced.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish merely to make a suggestion to the Senator in connection with his very interesting speech. Has the Senator the figures for the last three generalizations he has made; and if so, will he put them in his address?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not got them to-day. I take them generally from statements I have read in the reports. I think they are true. I do not know the exact amounts.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I thought I remembered that last year, for instance, cattle on the hoof in the farmer's field brought 8 cents. But the Senator has made three generalizations here of very great economic importance, and if he had the figures it would be very helpful to many who are studying the problem if he would insert them.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not got them here. I take them from the cattle shippers, and I think they are absolutely correct.

If we can place any dependence upon the magazine articles that have been written in the last fifteen years—not those written within the last two or three years of hysteria, but in the earlier period, such as come from the North American Review and magazines of that character—this has been the method adopted by the great trusts in their evolution from comparatively innocent bodies to those of the greatest concerns in the United States.

Mr. President, the people are asking for the enforcement of the present law. They are not asking particularly for the reenactment of the old law, which is being done in this bill, but they are asking for the enforcement of the laws we have to-day. They are asking that rebates shall cease. We have a law for that to-day. They are asking that the great shipper shall have no undue preference over the small shipper. We have a law for that to-day. They are asking that the owner of private cars shall not be able to charge such rentals for the use of his private cars that it operates in effect as a method of rebate which enables him successfully and easily to compete against smaller concerns.

In brief, what the people are asking for is simply honest dealing and an honest enforcement of the law. I know it is difficult to enforce a criminal law of any character, but I believe it is no more difficult to enforce this than almost any other law, and especially with the new provision which you have for a systematic method of bookkeeping.

I am informed that even an editor in New York has been able to unearth considerable of these rebates in the sacred recesses of the sugar trust, working unaided and alone, and if this is true, can you say that the Attorney-General, with the entire force and wealth of the country backing him, with any number of specialists to work up the case, is unable to do what an individual can do working alone? This new bill contains an admirable provision in the matter of a uniform system of keeping railway records which will, in my opinion, assist greatly in securing the proper evidence of rebates. Now, supplement this with a law compelling every rebate to be paid thrice over by the party receiving it, and, in my judgment, you will have completely destroyed the system.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. In the line of the Senator's argument, I call attention to the fact that the House of Representatives has passed a bill which is pending in the Senate before the Judiciary Committee, to forfeit rebates made to large corporations to which he refers, and providing for the recovery of double rebates at the suit of the Government in execution of the forfeiture provided by the bill. That is in line with the Senator's argument.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is absolutely in line, and it is in line with the recommendation of the President, with the exception that I make it a punishment, and it is a punishment only when it is more than a recovery back of the amount received.

Mr. SPOONER. This is in addition to other penalties.

Mr. McCUMBER. The provision which I have in my resolution here requires them to pay three times over, and especially would I enforce that against the party receiving the rebate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator embody his suggestion in a resolution?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is in my resolution which was read at the beginning of this address.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I am very much interested in his remarks. May I ask why the Senator does not put it in the way of an amendment to the bill itself? If it is in the form of a resolution how does he make it effective?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator was probably not here when I opened the address.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was not.

Mr. McCUMBER. After reading the resolution, I stated that there were two or three provisions in it which I would ask to have inserted as an amendment in the bill itself.

Mr. President, much more intolerable than rebates is the private car system which has grown into use. It is, in effect, a system of legalized discrimination of a most offensive nature. It is but another instrumentality in the hands of the monster industrial concern to secure special freight reduction, which, with its already great advantages, makes it the easier to drive its competitor out of the country's markets.

This is accomplished in three ways:

First, by charging such a high rate to the carrying railways for the use of the refrigerator car, over and above a fair rental value, as to constitute, in effect, the equivalent of a large rebate.

Second, by making such excessive and, in many instances, outrageous charges for icing and other privileges to outside parties using their cars as to wipe out their profits.

Third, by securing from the railway companies, by the same methods adopted in forcing rebates, special privileges, such as rushing their products to their destination ahead of those of their competitors and in securing for them special terminal privileges and advantages.

Mr. President, I am not an expert upon car building, but I have inquired from my friend on my right as to the cost of building the refrigerator cars. I am informed that it ranges from $800 to $1,100. We will take, therefore, $1,000 as a fair basis. We all understand that the cars are simply rented to the railways for three-quarters of a cent per mile. The companies using them pay full freight, but charge back for the car. It is stated by Mr. Hill, in his testimony before the Interstate Commerce Committee, that the average earnings of one of these cars is about $2.50 a day. Remembering that every one of the cars can practically be used either for meat or fruit; that some of them can be used in the southern fruit section one season of the year, in the California fruit section another, in the Michigan and Middle States another, while those for meat are used the year around, and remembering also that these trains run Sundays as well as other days, we can safely estimate that they will make a run of three hundred days in a year. That would bring in an income of $750; in other words, 75 per cent upon their investment in that car.

Of course there will be other expenses, but reduce it down to 50 per cent, if you please, that 50 per cent income will amount to what? Take it upon the first basis: If they were given simply a reasonable value on their investment at 6 per cent, they would receive $60 a year instead of $750 a year. The balance of that amount, or whatever the sum may be, above the $60, or a reasonable investment, is the equivalent of a rebate multiplied many times over.

Now, how can any small concern compete against those conditions? To overcome this I have recommended in this resolution, which I will ask to go in as an amendment, first, that all of these special private cars shall be brought under the rules and the laws of the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is already in the bill to-day. Secondly, that the charges for rental and use and for icing shall only be reasonable and just, to the end that the owner of those cars shall never have an unfair advantage over the smaller shipper. Thirdly, that at the end of about three years all railway companies doing an interstate business shall be compelled to own their own facilities and their own cars. The sooner the railway companies cease their partnerships with any of the shippers, the sooner they are divorced from all character of business outside that of the carrying business, the better I believe for the railways themselves and for the country.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator if in his suggestion he means to include cars engaged in the transportation of passengers as well as cars engaged in the transportation of freight?

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not, for the reason that I have heard no complaint of any abuses and extra charges by those cars. In fact, our sleeping cars, our Pullman cars, etc., I believe, give us better accommodations than we can get in the hotels for the same price, and we are traveling at the same time.

Mr. BACON. I merely asked the question of the Senator because his language was so general that it would include them.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not intend it to include them, although they might be included in the resolution.

Mr. President, the old law writers defined law as a rule of action prescribed by the supreme or sovereign power, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong. That definition, to my mind, should be the breadth, the scope, the limitations of government. If the Government will simply make good laws and then enforce those laws, there will never be any need for it to come down from its lofty position of governing to the position of entering into the industries of the country in competition with the people to whom those industries belong, because we well know that if we take that first step into the realm of paternalism, Government control of railway rates, I mean such control as would be manifested in the fixing and determining absolutely those rates, the next and sure to follow step, in my mind, will be the Government ownership of roads.

Why? Mr. President, because there is always an element of the public who are demanding it; and whenever there is such interference on the part of the Government in the running of the roads of the country that the owners themselves desire to get rid of them, then we will have this double force working together and forcing it upon the country.

Ordinarily, Mr. President, when there is a wrong to be remedied, the first thing considered by a legislative body whose duty is to remedy it, is to ascertain what is the best remedy. There may be a hundred bills introduced to cure the wrong, each having its advantages and defects.

It is scarcely possible that any one should be the perfect remedy. Each may have its virtues and vices, and out of all there should be selected those provisions which will insure the greatest amount of good and the least amount of harm. Why should a different rule prevail in this case? Why does anyone insist upon a different rule? The press of the country seems to have usurped the function of Congress, and said in advance of any consideration that one certain remedy is the only remedy. It has given no reasons in support of that contention, nothing but the bald statement.

Mr. President, it seems to me that whenever it comes to the question of deciding a matter according to our own judgment or according to the judgment of the press of the country, the people expect us to use our judgment, and to use it patriotically and honestly for them, and not to be swayed by any character of prejudice.

The committee was directed to take testimony upon this question. That testimony amounts to about five large-sized volumes, nearly all of which is directed toward the one question of the feasibility of conferring the rate-making power upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. Lawyers, railroad managers, scholars, shippers, men who have made railway economics the study of their life, foreign railway managers and those who have studied into that question all gave their testimony upon this subject, and the consensus of the opinion of all and the testimony of nearly every man to support the contention was that granting the rate-making power to any political board would be injurious to the country in the long run.

Now, sitting in judgment upon that specific question, the press ask us to disregard all of this testimony that has been taken carefully and laboriously, to disregard our own judgment, and simply pass a law on what they have seen fit to assert was necessary for the Government of this country.

Before considering the expediency of this question, there are certain legal propositions that rather obstruct our path, and some of them are very important. They are these: First, has Congress itself any constitutional power to fix rates for rail-

Secondly, conceding that it has, can it delegate that power to a commission? Is it legislative or administrative? That is, if it can be exercised by a commission, is it possible to exercise it in any way that will not be in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution against granting preferences to the ports of one State over the ports of another State?

Mr. President, our Attorneys-General and our ex-Attorneys-General, men who were presumed to know the law, seem to differ radically upon this subject. Lawyers of note upon this floor do not always agree upon the proposition. It raises at least a serious question as to what the decision of the courts will be when it is up for final adjudication. It raises a question of sufficient importance, as suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], to justify us in scrutinizing it with the greatest of care; and if we are sincere in wanting to get a bill that will benefit the public, and one that will stand as law, we should, then, strike from it everything that is absolutely unnecessary, and especially if it is also in our opinion unconstitutional.

Conceding, Mr. President, that all of these legal difficulties which I have mentioned can be overcome, that all of the propositions can be answered in the affirmative, we are led directly to the question of expediency. I am less concerned about the illegality of delegating the rate-making power to the Interstate Commerce Commission than about the propriety of it. If we should err in legal judgment in delegating this authority, the courts can correct our error, but if we should err in making this the law of the land this first step which we have taken in the realm of paternalism can never be retraced, but will compel us to take further steps and walk deeper and deeper into that realm of buried hopes, decaying ambitions, and moldering aspirations.

If the effect of granting this power will insure absolute equality to all shippers from any given point to another, if it will insure that elasticity in the matter of rates necessary for the development of certain sections of the interior and certain industries in the interior of the country, so that such sections or such industry may compete with others in the markets of the world; if it will tend to open up and keep open the greatest possible degree of competition between roads and between localities; if it will continue the gradual lowering of freight rates from the interior, as has been done in the past; if it is possible for a commission to give such enlightened judgment upon the questions of rates from every station on every railway in the United States as the demands of justice may require, then truly the rate-making power should be conferred upon a commission.

But if it can be demonstrated with almost mathematical accuracy that the placing of this gigantic power—the commercial destiny of every village, township, and county in the United States—in the hands of a political body of five or seven men will strangle the last vestige of railway competition, bind every section of our vast domain in the clasp of a hard and inflexible schedule of rates; that it will make the whole interior of the country pay homage to a few seaport cities, and, finally, that it will build up a great political machine that will hold both or all great political parties by the throat, then, in my humble opinion, the people do not want it.

At the very threshold of this discussion we are met with grave and far-reaching questions. How will that mighty power be exercised? Will it open up commerce and traffic to the freest and fullest competition, or will it practically close the gates against all competition? Will it tend to build up and promote the welfare of the great interior, the western arid and semi-arid regions of our extensive domains, which require the fullest and greatest elasticity in the matter of rates, or will it destroy such elasticity in rate making so necessary to the development of this section? Will it tend, by a hard rule, to fix rates absolutely, or will the result of its exercise leave perfect freedom to vary rates from day to day, from week to week, as the exigencies, the conditions of any locality along any line of railway may demand? Will its exercise tend to build up a few of the great seaports at the expense of the interior and at the expense of all other seaports, or will it tend to facilitate the progress and prosperity of the cities of the interior and the country tributary to them? Can a commission by a single order or 10,000 orders meet every contingency, every inequality of distance, inequality in amount carried, inequality of bonded indebtedness, inequality in maintenance, inequality of values, inequality of stock as compared with actual value, and the thousand other inequalities which must be weighed and measured in connection with rate making? Can five or seven men perform the duties now incumbent upon an army of 50,000 men?

Under our present laws railways may lower their schedules of rates upon three days' notice. They may raise the schedule upon ten days' notice. Except for these slight limitations the flexibility of rates is free to meet all commercial exigencies, the constant shifting of demands of production and consumption. When such rates shall have been established or fixed by a commission, their status can only be altered by the slow process of the rehearings before the Commission, in most cases ineffectual to meet the exigency because of necessary delay. To all intents and purposes, therefore, such rates will become fixed and unalterable. That this would have little effect upon a few of the seaport cities of our country may be conceded. But what effect will it have upon the interior, upon the West and great Northwest? This is a question of supreme importance.

To understand this we must first understand what forces have been responsible for the upbuilding of this great section in the past. Many of us on this floor have spent all of our lives in that section; have grown to manhood in that part of the United States. And every man who has watched our progress or development and the causes which conduced to it knows that the progress, the prosperity, the development of that country and its industries have been due to the efforts of each of the great transcontinental lines to build up the industries and the country along and contiguous to its own road, and that this has been accomplished by discrimination in rates—not discrimination between individuals, which is always pernicious, but discrimination in favor of their own territory; in other words, it has been accomplished by giving especially favorable rates to those sections.

It has been done by giving discriminations in rates as between localities. It has been done by giving preferences where those preferences were absolutely needed to build up a great country. And this is something that we can not justly and fairly take away from that section of country.

They have maintained immigration bureaus to attract settlers along the lines of their roads. They have given special rates to land seekers. They have given special rates for the purpose of developing industries. They have given special rates to laborers to harvest the farmers' grain. They have given special rates to develop the lumber industries of the Pacific slope. To meet these special privileges given by one great transcontinental line other lines of like character were compelled to do likewise, and these all working together have been responsible for making the interior the best country that God's sun ever shone upon. It is due, Mr. President, to this very discrimination, and if you enforce the law rigidly it can not but be injurious to that particular section of the country.

Discrimination in rates as between localities is at the very foundation of the progress and prosperity of every State without the immediate zone of large manufacturing industries, or whose products were far removed from the field of consumption. It is the application of the great Republican principle of protection to infant industries, a protection growing out of the inequality of conditions by reason of greater distance from the field of consumption.

You people of the East many years ago said to the Government: "On account of cheaper labor we are unable to compete with the Old World in our manufactures. To equalize this, give us a preferential tariff." We of the West said to the railroads: "On account of shorter hauls we are unable to compete with the Eastern and Middle States, whose products are raised at the very gates of the manufacturing centers which consume them. To equal this, give us preferential freight rates."

The Government gave to the East its tariff, and as if by magic 10,000 industries sprang into being in all the villages and hamlets, and the whole length of the Alleghenies became skirted with fiery furnaces giving a prosperity undreamed of. The railroads gave to the West rates that made it possible for it to compete with the eastern agriculturist and drive him out of his own fields, and as a result our Indian plains bloomed with the grains and the flowers of the white man's civilization, and homes, those fairest flowers of civilization, dotted our expansive prairies.

Without that discrimination there would have been no Dakotas, no Minnesota, no Montana, or Idaho, or Washington. Take away that discrimination, place us on a mileage basis, and our progress and prosperity would vanish like frostwork in the morning sun.

This matter of discrimination, Mr. President, is absolutely necessary for the building up of certain sections of the country, and it is absolutely necessary in order to maintain their present prosperity.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is it the Senator's position, then, that not only the present proposed law should not be enacted, but that the existing law on the same subject should be repealed?

Mr. McCUMBER. In my opinion, the present proposed law should be enacted with a modification. So that I may not be misunderstood, I will state that I expect to support the law which the wisdom or unwisdom of the Senate shall deem to be for the best interest of the American people, but I think, however, it should be modified. I think our present law in reference to discriminations has not been enforced, and because it could not be enforced is the reason why it has not been a greater damage to us than it really has been.

I can show you, and propose to show before I get through, that instead of enforcing the spirit of that law in the North Atlantic cases the Interstate Commerce Commission enforced exactly the opposite, by its own decision, and absolutely destroyed the competition which we claim is necessary for our own State.

Mr. SPOONER. When the Senator speaks of discriminations I suppose he refers to the discriminations which were lawful at the common law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; not discriminations between individuals——

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no.

Mr. McCUMBER. But discrimination in favor of the weaker locality or in favor of the weaker industrial concern as against the stronger that did not need it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. My question was drawn out by the statement of the Senator that certain portions of the country in the interior and farther west had been developed by reason of these discriminations which were an economic necessity and which the present law prevents, and that if the present law had been rigidly enforced those discriminations by which the interior has been built up would have been prevented and an incalculable injury, to use the Senator's own words, would have been done to the country. That is the reason why I asked the Senator whether his position was not only that the proposed law should not be enacted, but that the existing law should be repealed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I purpose to make that clear before I get through.

Mr. SPOONER. My observation had no reference whatever to the Senator's question. I simply wished to understand the Senator from North Dakota that when he spoke of preferences and discriminations, and the general question of facilities in the West, he referred to those which were permitted by the common law.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. He specifically said, however, they were those which were forbidden by the existing interstate-commerce act, which, if it had been rigidly enforced, would have prevented them.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the present interstate-commerce act had been rigidly enforced, there could have been no discriminations between localities, as I understand.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And therefore the Senator said the interior of the country and farther west would have been incalculably injured.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly. If, as a matter of fact, the railway company provides that its charges for taking our products out of our country shall be only one-half of what it charges for bringing things into our country between exactly the same points, you can see there is a discrimination in favor of output as against importation; and that discrimination was absolutely necessary for our growth and prosperity.

Mr. President, Minnesota is not yet fifty years of age as a State. It is my native State, and as I travel over that beautiful country with its fair fields, with its massive red barns, with its great white dwellings, and as I follow into my own Red River Valley of the North I will find the same condition, except perhaps on a little larger scale, as I view the prosperity of those great Northwestern States; and then as I compare those barns and those houses with many of those of the Eastern and the Middle States, whose gray, decaying walls have not known the touch of paint for fifty years—for, Mr. President, everybody will acknowledge that red and white paint are the surest index in the world of agricultural prosperity—as I look at those conditions I can not but ask myself by what magic has it been possible for us of the Dakotas and Minnesota and Iowa, nearly 2,000 miles from eastern seaports, where every bushel of our grain that we sell is to be carried across the ocean, to move that grain nearly 2,000 miles and drive the eastern agriculturist out of his own field? Has it been by any method of dividing the country into great sections, which they call differential sections, and so adjusting the rates between the several carrying lines that they will each receive their proportionate share, and also that each one of the great seaport cities will receive what this Commission may declare to be its proportionate share of the business; or has it been for the reason that I have stated, of the great effort of those companies to find outlets for our own exports?

What difference does it make to the Northern Pacific or the Great Northern Railroad Company, which are the principal routes in Minnesota and in my State, whether New York or Boston or Baltimore or Philadelphia gets their share of the business? What they are interested in is in securing the very lowest rates that can be secured from their terminals to the Atlantic coast, where our goods must pass en route across the ocean.

Mr. President, suppose that this gigantic power is given to this Interstate Commerce Commission, what is going to be the result? Will it be the destruction of all competition between the great carrying lines? I ask that question in all sincerity—will it be the destruction of competition between all the great carrying lines? Mr. President, coming events cast their shadows before. On the 27th day of April, 1905, the Interstate Commerce Commission handed down its findings and conclusions in the North Atlantic Seaport Differential case. That decision, to my mind, projects a shadow into the future that is as discernible and as clear as the shadow of an eclipse across the face of the earth and demonstrates beyond any possible question the certainty of the very danger that I have spoken of thus far in my discussion. This opinion foreshadows not only the condition which we will be in when the Interstate Commerce Commission fixes the rate, instead of the powers that are in possession to-day, but what the Government's position will be when we reach that next—and, to my mind, sure to follow step—Government ownership of the railways of this great country. Government ownership in the Old World has resulted in building up a few of the great seaport towns, congesting the people there and congesting traffic there, while at the same time it has absolutely destroyed the prosperity of all of the interior.

I might say a great deal, Mr. President, upon this subject, but it has been so eloquently stated by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] and by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that I will not touch upon that subject any further than to show that that has been the inevitable result. It has been said on this floor that these Commissioners will be human, men of good judgment, and the country need fear no tyrannical action. The surest—aye, the only—preventive against tyranny is to never place tyrannical power in the hands of any person or body of persons. But in this instance this autocratic power can only be carried on by autocratic methods, and tyranny will be the inevitable result.

Mr. President, it may be said at the outset that the granting of this power, in my opinion, will at one blow absolutely destroy competition between all of the great carrying lines of the country; it will strangle that very principle which we have inserted in every law—the free exercise of the competitive spirit of every one of the great carrying lines. It will be twofold worse, Mr. President, than that which we sought to guard against in the Northern Securities case. Why? Because in that case we simply prevented two competing lines from combining, while in this case you will place all of the great transcontinental lines under one great management, and, as I will show you, that management will be forced—absolutely forced—by industrial and commercial exigencies to follow the same rules that the railways followed when they made their own arrangements of pooling, because in effect it amounts to pooling.

Ever since these great rival lines connected the Atlantic seaboard with the interior of the country there has always been more or less freight warfare between the great lines and also between the great cities that were served by those lines, growing out of the adjustment or the lack of adjustment of differentials. Whether these wars were beneficial to the public in the long run I am not prepared to say. But the condition which existed there, and which made it possible for those wars, was of inestimable value to every shipper from the interior to the seaboard.

Mr. President, this decision makes perfectly clear what is meant by differentials; but as I am speaking for more than the Senate here, I will make my point clear, so that it may be distinctly understood what that term means.

That territory bounded on the west by the Mississippi, south by the Ohio River, east by a line running from Pittsburg to Buffalo, and north by the Great Lakes, is called "differential territory." All shipments for the east, originating directly or indirectly in this territory, had by agreement of the several lines of road operating between such territory and seaboard been based on the rate from Chicago to New York; that is, the rate between any point in this territory to New York was either the same as the Chicago rate to New York or a certain percentage less or greater than that rate. To other points on the Atlantic seaboard the rate is higher or lower than to New York by a given number of cents per hundred pounds. Thus the rate to Boston might be greater, that to Philadelphia and Baltimore less. These differences above or below the New York rate are termed "differentials."

At the time that this matter was considered by the Interstate Commerce Commission, rates upon all classes and commodities, with the exception of grain and iron, were 2 cents lower to Philadelphia and 3 cents lower to Baltimore than to New York. The Boston rates were the same as New York on export traffic, while on domestic traffic they were higher by amounts ranging from 7 cents per hundred pounds on first-class to 2 cents on sixth-class commodities. The question involved, however, differentials only on export traffic.

Now, anyone who has followed the cases decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission can not but be impressed with the great number which are instituted by or through the boards of trade of our great commercial cities, and that the spirit which governs the institution of these actions has not been such a desire to protect the interest of individual shippers as to secure the greatest amount of business for this or that particular city. This case was no exception to the rule. The real parties in interest, as in most cases, were cities against railroads, and not the public against railroads. The public was not the party to this action. If it was indirectly a party I can not but feel that its interests were shamefully dealt with. The parties to this action were the municipal corporations of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, on one part, and the several railroads operating between this differential territory and these cities on the other part. The interest to be considered, and which was, in fact, considered, was not the interest of the people of my State who might ship their grain to New York, Buffalo, or Baltimore, but the interests of those particular cities in securing what each claimed as its share of the business of the country, just as though any city independent of its location was entitled to any particular division or share of the business of the country.

Now, to show how this Commission walked the same path which has led, in the old country, to preferring great seaports, at the expense of the interior, upon the assumption that such cities are entitled, as a matter of right, whether they can honestly compete under natural conditions with other cities, to their share of the business, and thus destroying all competition, I wish to call attention to the reasonings and the conclusions of a majority of this Commission.

On page 62 of the decision in re North Atlantic seaport differentials the Commission say:

> It is said that a fair differential is one which would give to those ports the traffic to which they are entitled. It is also said that these several ports are entitled to what of this traffic they can obtain upon a fair differential.

They are entitled not to what they can secure under fair competition, but under a fair (equalizing) differential. By what process of reasoning does the Commission arrive at a conclusion that any city as a matter of right is entitled to such differential that it may obtain its proper proportion of the export business of the country? If Baltimore is one-half the size of New York, then under this decision those rates must be so fixed that Baltimore will get one-third of the export business and New York will get the other two-thirds.

Mr. President, we have condemned, and we condemn to-day, pooling between railways. This principle adopted by the Interstate Commerce Commission not only legalizes pooling, but fastens it upon all railways. That simple proposition that rates are to be made for the benefit of cities and not for the benefit of the public condemns beyond all measure the power which would authorize such principle being carried into effect by any political body.

I want to say to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who so ably defended and pleaded for his own New England States the other day as against the arbitrary power that might be given this Commission, he may well complain if there is no way that we can escape that arbitrary power, for if they follow the opinion they may protect New England, but that opinion is not the law. If they do not follow it, they destroy the industries of New England and many of the industries of the interior.

Again, on page 62, the Commission say:

> Again it can be properly done, these rates should be so adjusted that competitive traffic will be fairly distributed between the different lines of railway which serve these ports. Each one of these four cities is served by two or more great railway systems. The prosperity of these cities and systems can not be separated. The ability of a railway adequately discharge its duty for a reasonable charge depends upon the business which it can obtain, and no one of these systems should be deprived of its fair proportion of this export trade.

In simple, plain English what does this mean? It means that the public must be compelled to support a road if that road can not of itself compete with another road; that the rates must be so adjusted that the weaker one shall receive its proportion of the carrying business. For illustration: If the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad can carry my grain from Chicago to Baltimore for 5 cents per hundred pounds less than the Pennsylvania line can carry it to New York, I shall not have the benefit of this natural competition and Baltimore shall not have the benefit of its location; but that the Pennsylvania line must be supported and must have its proportion of that traffic, and if it can not be secured in any other way, the Baltimore and Ohio road must raise its rates or else the other road must lower its rates; and if the other road can not afford to lower its rates, then the Baltimore and Ohio must raise its rates. That is the same Commission to whom you are going to give the power to determine what are just and fair rates.

Does not the mere statement of the proposition by the Interstate Commerce Commission carry with it its own condemnation? Carrying this proposition out in all the great transcontinental lines, that road which has been built or may in the future be built through a poor country, a country that will not give it sufficient business to pay its running expenses, must have its proportion of the carrying trade, and rates must be so made by the other lines that it may secure its proper proportion.

It has always been supposed in the past that great cities were entitled to the enjoyment of the conditions which made them great so long, and only so long, as they subserved the interest of the public, and that railroads were quasi public institutions, because they subserved the interest of the public. The conclusion of the Interstate Commerce Commission reverses this rule and promulgates the startling proposition that the public interest must be subservient to the demands of great cities for the continuation of their prosperity, and that the public business is for the benefit of all the roads or at least all such as the Commission may consider of sufficient importance to demand its protective care. That is certainly a new theory.

Again they say, on page 63:

> Now, if there had been no export business in the past, if these domestic rates had been adjusted solely with a view to what was right between the communities, it is altogether probable that the differentials in favor of Baltimore and Philadelphia would have been even greater than they are to-day.

But constituting itself as the guardian of the interests of New York and Boston, the Commission decided that the differentials should be even less than they are to-day, so that these latter cities could enjoy greater commercial prosperity and the whole country, the producer, is made to pay higher freights for the benefit of Boston and New York.

I am not criticising these Commissioners, because I insist that when that power is given them it will have to be exercised along such lines or else they will so disrupt all rates as to produce a case of practical anarchy among all the railroads.

Again, they had to take into consideration the ocean freights. They had to look beyond Boston and Philadelphia and Baltimore. They found, for instance, that our goods, our wheat and corn, would go through the route of least resistance, and that meant the cheapest route, not merely to the seaboard, but to Liverpool, where our grain was carried. They found also that the rates from Baltimore to Liverpool were generally a little more than from New York and Boston, while the facilities for handling and shipping at New York and Boston were better than at Baltimore. They so equalized these different conditions and weighed them and measured them that it became possible for them to arrive at a differential which would allow each of these roads to carry what they considered its proper proportion and each of these cities to have its proportionate share of the business.

On page 69 of this opinion the Commission give us another view. They say:

> In view of the fact that Baltimore and Philadelphia have natural advantages in location, that Boston and New York have certain natural advantages in the way of ocean facilities, that it is impossible to make and maintain the same rate through all the ports, we think the true inquiry in adjusting this differential is, What will equalize the advantages of transportation through these various ports? What part of the advantage which Baltimore and Philadelphia enjoy on the score of the inland haul shall they be allowed to retain to compensate them for their disadvantage in the water haul?

In other words, neither Baltimore nor Philadelphia shall retain the natural advantages which they have by reason of location to any extent that will more than equalize any special advantage that New York and Boston have in ocean facilities. If this is not fixing up competition, then I would like to be informed of any process or any combination of the railroads themselves which could more effectually strangle competition.

Again, on the same page, they say:

The most important factor in determining the route is undoubtedly the rate. It was said in testimony upon the former investigation, and has been repeated in this, that a difference of from one-fourth to one-eighth of a cent a bushel will determine the port to which grain shall be exported. Other traffic is not equally sensitive, but it must follow, with respect to this low grade freight, that the through rate by all lines should be substantially the same.

Now, note their decision: "It must follow with respect to this low grade freight that the through rate by all lines should be substantially the same." Why should the rates by all lines be substantially the same? Why should not the shipper have the benefit of the lines which can carry his goods most cheaply to any port? The answer of the Commission is that if that natural rule should apply certain cities would not receive their share of the export business and certain railroads would not receive their share of the carrying trade. They decided that it was their duty to look after the interest of those roads and those cities which can not, under natural laws and natural conditions, compete with other roads or other cities; and they considered it their duty to so check and interfere with the natural law of competition that it shall not work against the interest of such roads or such cities. I candidly ask the question, Is this what the people of my country or of any of the inland country are asking for? If it is not, is it what they will surely get if the Commission has power to give it to them? I am not blaming or complaining of the Commission. It will be compelled to take the place of the traffic managers of all railways. To-day each manager is compelled to look after the interests of his own system. When he is supplanted by the Interstate Commerce Commission that Commission must look after the interest of their system, and it can only do so by so adjusting rates so that everyone shall receive its portion of the business, because it has stated again and again that the public necessities demand that each one of these roads shall receive its proper proportion of the carrying business in order that it may properly subserve the interests of the people along its line.

So they are driven into the same position that they have been driven into in the old countries; and I am doubtful if they will get as good an adjustment of it as they would if they would leave it entirely in the hands of the present managers.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The Senator appears to be reading from the finding of the Commission in the case of the seaboard discriminations or preferentials submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a voluntary arbitration. Does the Senator claim that there is anything in the existing law that would give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the jurisdiction which they voluntarily, at the request of the railway companies, exercised in that case?

Beyond that, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the pending bill expressly excludes, or in effect excludes, the jurisdiction to determine these differentials and confines the jurisdiction of the Commission entirely to a complaint against a given carrier for excessive or discriminating rates, and does not authorize the Commission in any way to enter this field of territorial discrimination, weighing against each other the separate and independent railway systems of the country or the independent and separate markets of the country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator speaks of the existing law. Under the existing law the Commissioners held in that case that they could not make it binding upon the company, but that that was the law which should govern and it is the law which they would enforce if they had the power to enforce it. The pending bill, by giving them the power to fix maximum rates, in my opinion, does give them the power to enforce exactly that provision. Let us suppose that here is a line from Chicago to New York and another line running from Chicago to Baltimore and New York. One line can afford, by reason of its facilities, by reason of its not being too greatly in debt, and a thousand other reasons, to carry grain, say, at 20 cents a hundred. When the Commission pass upon the question of the rate on grain for that railroad alone they are compelled to say that that 20 cents a hundred is a reasonable rate. When they come to the other road they will find that it can not pay dividends unless it charges 25 cents a hundred, yet by saying that the rate upon the first road shall be 20 cents a hundred they are compelled by the logic of events to hold that that is a reasonable rate between Chicago and New York, because the product is going by the road that will take it the cheapest. So the other road would be destroyed. But following the North Atlantic differential case, they would be compelled to call a halt and say the interests of the country demand that reasonable rates shall be so construed that they will be reasonable for every one of these roads, so that they all may participate in the traffic.

I have tried to study out the real meaning and intendment of this rate-making power. I should like to ride in your train if I knew what station it was going to land me in; but there is not a single one among your own advocates who can tell me the direction it is going or on what track it is running. None of you arrive at the same conclusion as to where you are going because you do not start upon your first basis; and that is the basis of reasonableness. I know of no method of determining accurately the question of reasonableness, except you take up one road at a time, and if you do that you have got just as many reasonable rates as there are roads and all different. On the other hand, if you take a railroad that can haul for the least amount between two given points and you make that your basis, then every one of the other roads will have to carry unreasonably low to compete; and if you take as a basis the road that will be the most expensive, whether it is by valuation or anything else, then the rate of every other road will be unreasonably high; and if you take some middle ground between them, then half of them, on one side, will be unreasonably high and the other half unreasonably low.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator said a moment ago that not one of us knew where we are going or where the train would land. Does the Senator know where he is going? [Laughter.]

Mr. McCUMBER. I am going to stand where I am until the Senator shows where he is going to land me; but if he can show me a better place than where I am, I am going with him. I do not want the Senator to understand that because I criticise this portion of the bill, I am opposed to the bill as a whole.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator said a moment ago, if he will permit me, that this territory, speaking of the inland territory, had been built up by reason of favoritism. He did not use that language exactly, but that was the idea—that there had been discrimination in favor of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. You can use that language, because that is what I mean.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have seen a good many statements coming from farther west, where there is a great outcry over the discrimination against those points—Denver, Spokane, and other points are loud, howling, in fact, because they say they are practically being destroyed by this very favoritism; and I, for one, have been trying to go to that point where everybody will have an equal show, and where you will have no discrimination between sections or between localities or between individuals.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question, if the Senator from North Dakota will permit me.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina whether this bill, in his opinion, gives jurisdiction to the Commission over the question of differentials?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not examined that particular point.

Mr. ALDRICH. Well, it is the most vital point in the bill or one of the most vital points, and it is a question about which there seems to be a difference of opinion.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I would be glad to have any Senator answer it who thinks he can.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to all Senators.

Mr. BEVERIDGE (to Mr. ALDRICH). Repeat the question.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is whether the bill before the Senate gives to the Commission jurisdiction over differentials between different localities and ports.

Mr. TILLMAN. The main thing in it is to give the Commission jurisdiction over the fixing of rates.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was content with the Senator's first answer, which seemed to be conclusive. I would be glad to have some one else who will give a different answer.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The jurisdiction given by section 15 of the bill is plain, I think. It gives jurisdiction to the Commission where a complaint is made that a given rate is too high or is in the nature of a discrimination forbidden by law, to make an order prescribing a maximum rate and an order to require the carrier to cease and desist from the discrimination in so far as they find it to exist. The complaint authorized is under section 13 of the existing law, and must be directed against a given carrier or, where more than one carrier participates in a joint rate, against the carriers participating in it. It will be seen, therefore, that the bill deals with no rates except rates that are too high, charged by a carrier, or in the case of a joint rate, by the carriers who participate in it, and with cases of discrimination made by a carrier on its own line or upon the joint line of more than one carrier participating in the same joint carriage.

It is therefore obvious that the bill applies to no excessive rates and no discriminations except such as are involved in the carriage of goods over a particular line or a joint line. It does not therefore include these port differentials or any of the territorial conflicts, such as the one that was recently submitted by the trunk lines to the voluntary arbitration of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. McCUMBER. Evidently we differ a little upon the construction of that law. Let us suppose that the board of trade of the city of Minneapolis, in Minnesota, should lay before the Commission the charge that the rates charged on all of class A freight between Minneapolis and Chicago over the Chicago and Milwaukee road was excessively high and unjust. Does the Senator mean to say to me that the Commission would not be compelled to take cognizance of that matter? If I understand the law, you may not only bring in one little shipment, but you may also invite the railroad commissioner of any State to make up a schedule of rates which he says are too high, and the Commission has to consider those; and if I can understand law at all, if I can construe the language of that measure, if I read it correctly, then the power lies with the board absolutely to consider not only one article, but any class of articles between any two cities, and that in effect will determine the whole question. If you can take up one class, you can take them all up in the same way.

Mr. ALDRICH. But this provision of section 15 of the bill as it came from the House directs the Commission to inquire into any rates that are otherwise in violation of the provisions of "this act"—that is, the interstate-commerce act; and the third section of the interstate-commerce act reads as follows:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic.

Those words are written into the interstate-commerce act, and any rates which are in violation of that provision it is the duty of the Commission to consider and report upon as much as upon the question of reasonableness. I can not understand the use of language if that does not give to the Interstate Commerce Commission jurisdiction over differentials.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Will my friend the Senator from North Dakota permit me?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Admitting what the Senator from Rhode Island says, it is evident that the discriminations referred to there are not such discriminations as might be claimed to arise by comparing the rate on the Illinois Central from Chicago to New Orleans with the rate on the Lake Shore and New York Central from Chicago to New York City.

Mr. ALDRICH. "Any" is the word used.

Mr. DOLLIVER. But it is not competent to establish a charge against the Illinois Central on account of a discrimination made by some other railroad. The whole object of this bill has been to narrow the jurisdiction of the Commission to a complaint directed to be made by certain authorized parties against a common carrier, or, where there is more than one, against the railroads interested in the joint carriage. There can not be found in the bill a line which authorizes the Commission to weigh the rates to New York against the rates on another railroad to New Orleans, or Baltimore, or Philadelphia, or anywhere else.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield to the Senator, and then I will proceed.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa, if the Senator from North Dakota does not object, how otherwise under this bill, if it become a law, it would be possible for the Interstate Commerce Commission to hear and determine whether the rate from Chicago to New York is an unreasonable rate as compared with the rate to Baltimore and Philadelphia, when it, because of the differential, is put 2 or 3 cents lower, and for no other reason?

Mr. DOLLIVER. The Interstate Commerce Commission will be required under this bill to deal with the complaint on its merits, to make whatever inquiry is necessary, to use the information it has and all the information it can get, but directed to the question whether the rate complained of as excessive is in reality too high.

Mr. FORAKER. That is it precisely; but the question we are determining is whether or not the rate from Chicago to New York is excessive as compared with the rate from Chicago to Philadelphia or Chicago to Baltimore. The complaint may not be in that exact form, but necessarily, if there is an intelligent investigation, it will comprehend that, because it is only by considering relative rates that you can determine whether or not a difference of 2 or 3 cents on grain from Chicago to New York is a discrimination; and if the Commission would be compelled to consider that, the whole system of differentials goes to the wall, and the disruption which the Senator from North Dakota has pictured so eloquently and forcibly would inevitably follow, for according to the finding of the Commissioners themselves a difference of one-eighth of a cent per bushel on grain from Chicago to New York would destroy the whole distribution that has been brought about between the roads and the cities by this differential.

Mr. McCUMBER. I really can not understand the position of the Senator from Iowa when he considers section 3 of the law as it now stands. The bill which he is advocating provides for the enforcement of the provisions of that law, and as this law prevents anything which would be a discrimination as between localities as well as between persons, and as discrimination between localities is always a question of differentials, of course the Commission must consider and fix differentials in order to prevent those discriminations between localities.

Mr. DOLLIVER. It is true that section 3 refers to differentials, but not to differentials such as he is talking about. It refers to differentials that may exist along a line of railroad between the localities served by the railroad.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, he will certainly concede, when his attention is called to it, that the kind of differential, to employ his expression, to which he now refers is known in technical language as a "preferential."

Mr. DOLLIVER. Very well.

Mr. FORAKER. Differentials are those that apply to ports, and the term has been correctly employed by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The word "differential" applies to ports, but section 3 of the original interstate-commerce act does not refer to such discrimination as may arise out of the fact that one railroad charges more than another, but out of the fact that the same railroad charges one point on its line more than another.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Iowa must find that distinction outside of the language of the act, because the language of the act is broad enough to cover and does cover in terms any possible discrimination between localities.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from North Dakota permit me to ask the Senator from Iowa just one more question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. In the interstate-commerce bill, as it is called, presented by the Interstate Commerce Commission, it was carefully provided that they should have jurisdiction not only to determine maximum rates, but minimum rates, and to fix differentials. When the bill which is now under consideration was introduced, or, at least, when it came here, that had been taken out of it. I want to ask the Senator from Iowa why it was that all allusion to differentials in terms was stricken out of the bill, except only for the reason that he foresaw that it would be absolutely impossible for the Commission to fix differentials, that it would be in conflict with——

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will say frankly that my study of the question convinced me that it would be quite impossible, and for practical purposes possibly dangerous to the commercial peace of the country, to clothe the Interstate Commerce Commission with the power against which my honorable friend the Senator from North Dakota is contending. I studied very carefully that decision and other decisions in which they undertook to exercise this territorial jurisdiction, weighing one market against another and one railroad against another, although they serve far separate communities; and upon a study of the question, running over a very long space of time, I became convinced that such a jurisdiction ought not to be conferred upon the Commission. That suggestion of the Interstate Commerce Commission was omitted in the bill which I had the honor to introduce in the Senate because I recognized the force of what the Senator from North Dakota has said in relation to this matter, and I did not desire to be put in the attitude of seeking to clothe the Commission with that vast power over the competitive market places of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator undoubtedly——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me for a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to ask the Senator from Iowa for his opinion. He has given the bill careful examination. In his opinion, would it work no change in this bill to insert in it a proviso that it is not the intention of this bill and it shall not be construed to authorize the Commission to fix differentials?

Mr. DOLLIVER. If the word "differential" has a fixed and technical definition, as my friend from Ohio suggests, I certainly would have no objection to that. I would rather, however, clothe the proposition in such general phraseology as would avoid any uncertainty as to the word "differential." In the testimony before our committee the word seemed to be used indiscriminately to describe the differences between the rates of different railroads and between different points on the same railroad; and there evidently was some confusion in the technical meaning of the term. But so far as this bill is concerned—and I do not know whether anybody agrees with the bill or not—the intention of it was to narrow the jurisdiction of the Commission to the simple business of reducing a rate which was found to be too high or reducing a rate at the high point which was found to be a discrimination against localities along the lines of the carriers interested in that rate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota has not yet yielded. Does he yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would if I had not yielded so often for the Senator from Iowa to answer questions.

Mr. BACON. Then I will not trespass upon the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. However, I will yield this time to let the Senator from Georgia ask the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota yields.

Mr. BACON. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator, but I realize the fact that possibly he has extended it as far as he should, and desires to conclude his speech. I can make the inquiry at some other time. While I appreciate it, I will not take advantage of the Senator's courtesy.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. President, I do not think that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] comprehends the point I desire to make in this respect, and I will give a concrete case. We will suppose that the Northern Pacific will make rates to Tacoma, on the western coast, lower on a certain class of goods, or on all export goods, than the Great Northern will make to Seattle. The result would be that the Northern Pacific would get that business. It would get all of the export business, and Tacoma would be the exporting city.

Now, following the decision and the rule that was laid down in the North Atlantic Differential case, what would be the duty of the Commission when the case is brought up before it? They have said that it is not to the interest of the public that the business shall be taken by one line entirely away from the other. They have said that it is not for the interest of the public that the people of the great cities should be deprived of their export business. They have given that—and with good reason, I think, in many instances—as the very foundation of their holding.

Now, what I mean to say is that when the Commission pass upon the reasonableness of the rate of the Northern Pacific from Minneapolis or St. Paul to Tacoma, they will be forced, by the logic of the situation, in order to maintain a proper equilibrium, which will be for the benefit of the public, also to consider what would be the effect upon the other roads of lowering the rate to a certain amount. I am not only defending them upon that proposition, but I am insisting that unless we have absolutely chaotic conditions with respect to our railways that will be absolutely necessary. The railways themselves have found it necessary in order to continue the business without a continuous rate warfare, and I believe the Commission will be justified in holding more or less to that particular contention.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to go a little further.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is, whether there is not this distinction: I understand the Senator to refer to the case of a rate from Minneapolis to Tacoma by the Great Northern and from Minneapolis to Seattle by the Northern Pacific.

Mr. KEAN. Just the reverse.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just the reverse.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Just the reverse; and he assumes that one rate—the rate to Seattle—is less than the other, and in that way Seattle would absorb all the export business. Now, we will assume that these two roads were in one ownership. I can imagine then that under this bill if that preference were given to Seattle over Tacoma or to Tacoma over Seattle, a complaint would be made under this act. But if the two roads are in separate ownership, each in the ownership of a corporation, I do not see how the Interstate Commerce Commission could be called upon then to determine the question for the only complaint, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will make that clear.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The only complaint will be of the action of a particular road in the area of its own territory.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know; but suppose——

Mr. NEWLANDS. And a comparison with the action of another road in——

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will not furnish any basis for determining the reasonableness or the unreasonableness of the charge by the individual road.

Mr. McCUMBER. The point is simply here. Suppose the rate on the Northern Pacific is challenged as being still too high. Suppose the Northern Pacific can carry freight at rates at which the Great Northern can not profitably carry it to Seattle, and the rate of the Northern Pacific is still challenged as being too high, that they could afford to carry cheaper even than the rate fixed; then I say that the Interstate Commerce Commission will be forced to take into consideration what other roads could carry it for in fixing a standard of reasonableness for the Northern Pacific.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Not, it seems to me, if the Interstate Commerce Commission——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How will the Commission get jurisdiction over the Great Northern?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not speaking of any jurisdiction over the Great Northern. I say the Commission would not reduce the rate if the effect of the reduction would be to deprive Seattle of its business or to drive the Great Northern out of business. In other words, they will fix no rate that will send another railway, a competing line, into bankruptcy or that will seriously injure it. That is the proposition which I have been trying to lay down.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not understand, let me say to the Senator, that the Interstate Commerce Commission, in determining the reasonableness of rates upon a given road, is to allow the rates on another and different line to enter into the calculation at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then the Senator has not understood the argument I have been trying to deduce, and that which is clearly deducible, from the North Atlantic Differential case, where they claimed that it is necessary and proper to take that matter into consideration.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator must recollect that that case was not considered under the interstate-commerce act. It was considered as a matter of voluntary arbitration between the parties.

Mr. McCUMBER. It was an arbitration, but in that they are laying down a few general propositions that would govern in fixing rates.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That govern them in voluntary arbitration——

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; and in involuntary arbitration.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And not in exercising authority under the interstate-commerce act? It seems to me the Supreme Court has laid down the rule in Smith v. Ames as to what shall be considered in determining the reasonableness of rates, and they simply consider the question of value and return upon value—the value of the individual road and the return upon the value of the individual road—and no other considerations than those are alluded to in that opinion.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the value of one road, if fixed by what it can pay, is three times, perhaps, as great as the value of another road that is beside it and competing with it. That is not a basis for determining it, and I confess I do not know any reasonable basis for determining it. It has to be determined according to the exigencies, the conditions of the trade throughout the country, the law of supply and consumption. That is what will necessarily have to determine it, and it will not be based upon the valuation of any other road.

I wish to call attention to another matter, and then I will pass from this. On page 70 the Commission say:

And does the result fairly show? Does this competitive traffic move to and from these ports freely, or do these differentials give to Baltimore and Philadelphia a distinct and unfair advantage over New York and Boston?

They conclude that it does, and therefore modify the differentials accordingly. What does the Commission mean by an unfair advantage? It calls a natural advantage which would give greater business to Baltimore and Philadelphia and the roads leading thereto unfair. They apply it to serving the entire public. And its idea of fairness demands a surrender of the benefits of a natural advantage.

Again, on page 74, they say:

It is therefore possible that in the future it may become evident that Boston can not fairly compete for this traffic upon the present basis; but we do not feel that the record before us would justify that in existence to-day.

So, however, in the future it shall appear to the Commission that Boston can not fairly compete with Philadelphia or Baltimore, then the Commission will see to it that Baltimore and Philadelphia rates are so increased that Boston can compete.

Finally, on page 75, in treating of ex-lake traffic, the Commission say:

These four cities are all seaports. This is a fundamental advantage of location which entitles each and every one of them to participate in the export business and the public requires that this right shall be recognized.

Now, that is a judicial or semi-judicial utterance, "and the public interest requires that this right shall be recognized"—the right of this differential in their favor—so that they may secure their proper proportion of the business. I am not denying that perhaps the public interest in the long run will require that.

Now, why does the Commission stop with these four seaports? Why should not the same rule apply to Portland, Me., or Charleston, S. C., or any other of the smaller ports? On what theory does the Commission base its finding that each of these cities is entitled to participate in the export business? The only cities that are entitled to participate, according to the economics of my country, which is the shipper, are those cities that can furnish us the cheapest transportation between the field of production and the field of consumption in the old country, where it is going; and if Boston can do better than any other city, then, according to our views, Boston is entitled to the whole of it. But according to the views of the eastern people who are interested in building up Boston and building up their industries, the essential interest of the people of that section is exactly the contrary.

Commissioner Clements dissented quite strongly against this proposition. The view which I have taken in reference to this decision, and the view which, it seems to me, must be taken by everyone who is an advocate of honest competition, seems for the most part to be exactly in harmony with the view taken by Commissioner Clements, as shown in his dissenting opinion; and as that opinion demonstrates more clearly than I am able to do the dangers which would follow from carrying into effect this decision if the power were actually given to the Commission, I will avail myself of the privilege of quoting from his dissenting opinion. After considering many of the conclusions of the majority, he says, page 78:

If this were a proceeding against a carrier reaching by its lines all of the ports in question, it would be within the jurisdiction of the Commission to deal with the differences in rates as discriminations between localities by such carrier and, if found undue, to condemn them. * * * But there is a manifest and radical difference between an order of discrimination like that by a carrier between places on its line and which is clearly covered by the provisions of the third section of the act to regulate commerce, and the fixing of differentials in rates to or through the various ports and over independent and competing railroads. In the latter case the law has undertaken to leave the free play of competition to adjust rates, subject only to the reasonable rule of each carrier that its rates shall be reasonable and just and shall not unduly discriminate between commodities or between persons and localities reached or served by it.

In this he properly differentiates a discrimination by a railroad between localities along its line and a differential in rates to various ports over different competing lines. I think, however, that when this supervisory control is given to the extent of absolutely fixing the rates by the Commission, he will be compelled to follow the rule adopted by the other four members.

Again he says, page 78:

The foregoing report proceeds upon the idea that there is some intimate and ascertainable standard of fairness by which there can be fixed a limited and proper degree of competition and measure of adjustment of the traffic between the ports and carrier other than that wrought by competition. The law undertakes to fix no such standard or limitation; nor does it authorize the Commission to do so even for the purpose of putting to rest these questions so long and so often involved in the competitive contests between carriers.

And it might be added that the law neither undertakes to fix such standard or limitation, nor ought it ever to put in the hands of a Commission the power to fix such standard or limitation.

Again he says, page 79:

Thus it is seen the purpose and effect of the conclusions is to declare what differences in rates the railroads should make to the four ports for the purpose of distributing the business. Whether the carriers see fit to follow the suggestions of the Commission, which they are, of course, in no sense bound to do, or decline to accede to the same, will, in my opinion, leave the Commission in an embarrassing attitude.

If they acquiesce we will have gone beyond our authority to interfere in the course of trade, determining the direction and destination of commerce, a matter with which we are not charged. To-morrow we may be called upon to determine what share the Gulf ports may have and the Gulf roads carry, the next day to fix the proportion to which the Pacific coast is entitled.

And, again, he very forcibly says on page 80:

In declaring as between competing lines and competing ports what differentials shall govern, assuming that they will govern, we hamper competition, and by this regulation of distribution effect in reality a division of territory, a division of traffic, and a division of earnings, which in substance and effect tend to defeat not only the purposes of the antitrust act against the restraint of trade, but the leading provision of the interstate-commerce act, with the enforcement of which the Commission is charged.

And, again, on page 81:

May competing carriers lawfully effect, through the agency of the Commission, restraint of competition and trade by a division of traffic between themselves and the ports, when to do the same thing through an agency of their own would be unlawful? I think not.

In this last quotation he clinches the argument that forcing a division of traffic by the rate-making power destroys the very competition that we are seeking to maintain.

Mr. President, I believe it is to the best interest of the country, or certain sections of the country, that railroads should have the right to discriminate in their favor, not that they may raise the rates unreasonably high, but that they may place the rates unreasonably low. I will give a case of this kind. Suppose citizens of Oshkosh, Wis., go to the Milwaukee or whatever road serves them and say, "We have the timber here; we should like to build up a great furniture manufacturing industry; but Grand Rapids, in Michigan, has corralled all the Chicago business; they have been running for fifty years; they can conduct their business so economically that for several years at least we could not compete with them; and our only method of competition is for you to give us preferential special rates to the Chicago market." The railway says, "We will haul your products for three years for just exactly what it will cost, and after that we will raise the rate to such an extent as we can afford to carry them. This will then build up your industry."

Now, the Commission appears and says, under the law which you would pass, "You can not give this rate to that particular city unless you give it to every other city on the line, and to every other person who is attempting to build up any kind of an industry along any particular line." Thus you are deprived of building up a business there that would benefit the railways and would benefit also the country.

You deprive them of competition. I recall this character of a condition: Here is a section of country where they raise nothing but potatoes, or another section where they raise nothing but flax. They have raised an excellent crop of potatoes there, but at the same time they have raised an excellent crop over the country, and they find, when they want to ship those potatoes to the market, the freight rates will equal what they can get for them in the market of consumption. The railway says, "We will carry these goods this year at even less than cost. We will carry them for the express purpose of keeping that business there. To do that we will have to lower our rates here, and we will have to raise them, it may be, in the wheat-raising section, because we can not afford to cut down the general result of our income to meet running expenses."

Under this law they could not do it. They could not change the rate except upon thirty days' notice, and in thirty days the potatoes would be rotten.

I believe that the best interest, especially of any new country, demands that a railway may discriminate in favor of any locality by giving especially low rates to one particular industry; that while they shall be always prohibited from making any rate unreasonably high, they shall not be prohibited from making one unreasonably low for a legitimate purpose.

Mr. President, in the Old World the railway management simply supplies the demand for carriage. They do not attempt to make markets. They supply the demand for the markets. The exact reverse is the rule in this country. Our railways, especially in a new country, must give special attention to creating markets. Their management must study the demand; they must carefully compare the field of production with the field of consumption, not only in this country but in every other country. They must build up and stimulate trade. In this country they make the demand; they work for it; they develop industries, and they find markets. As long as they do this, then I say that they should have the privilege of giving such special and low rates under certain conditions to certain places in the country as would be beneficial to the part of the country that is given those particularly low rates.

Now, Mr. President, answering the Senator from South Carolina about the complaints in the southwestern part of the country. The southwestern cattle raisers complain somewhat not that their rates are too high—they are not saying that—but they say that compared with the rates North Dakota and Montana get they are not treated fairly; that their rates are much higher than in those States. So the lumbermen from the South say that the rates from the southern lumber districts as compared with the rates from the Pacific coast districts are excessively high, thus favoring the Pacific coast.

That is true for three reasons. First, those rates were made excessively low for the very purpose of developing that western lumber industry. Again, the railroad companies could afford to do it, because the industry is of such importance that they can haul loaded trains both ways. Again, they do it because the settlement along the northern roads is much more dense than it is along the southwestern roads, and therefore they can carry cheaper. Now, if the railways can give us that benefit we are entitled to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do I understand the Senator to contend that the population along the road from Dakota to the Pacific coast, where these lumber districts are, is more dense than it is from any point in the South northward?

Mr. McCUMBER. I said the Southwest.

Mr. TILLMAN. Going over to Texas as far as our lumber district extends?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will take the section on the Rio Grande, the roads that run to Denver and to the coast. They pass through more country that is unsettled a certain portion of the distance than the roads running through the northern section. Minnesota and the Dakotas are very well settled. There are great settlements in Washington and along the Northern Pacific. Along the Great Northern road we have a considerable population in every one of the States, while in portions of Nevada and portions of California, in Utah, Arizona, and the other sections there is very much less population, and of course less business.

Mr. TILLMAN. I think the Senator will find on examination that he is away from the facts in regard to the density of population in the country between the Pacific and the Dakotas or the part of the country south of the Dakotas which is near the edge of the arid belt. I know it runs between the ninety-ninth and the hundredth parallel; but there is no part of that country that is at all comparable to any part of the Southwest in lumber. There may be no lumber away out in the Rio Grande country; I do not think there is; it is too dry; but from any part of Texas where there are trees I am sure northward through the Indian Territory and Oklahoma the country is four times—ten times—as densely populated as any part of the country west referred to, until you reach the Pacific coast.

Mr. McCUMBER. That may be true as to certain portions of it. But now let me take up this same matter of the discrimination in favor of localities. In the early part of the history of North Dakota, or of the Dakotas, all of our lumber came from the pine woods of Minnesota and Wisconsin and Michigan. There was very little competition. But away to the west of us lay the immense primeval forests of fir and pine of Oregon and Washington. We needed their lumber and they needed our market. They were too remote from the field of consumption to compete with the lumbermen of Minnesota and Wisconsin on anything like equal carrying charges. The only way to meet this condition was by discrimination, and by a great discrimination in favor of the western product and even over the same line of road.

So the managers of our northern railways said to the lumbermen of the west coast, "For what carrying charges can you compete on the plains of Dakota with your lumber as against Minnesota and Wisconsin?" They thought they could compete on a 65-cent rate per hundred. The railroads said, "We do not think you can compete on a 65-cent rate. If you will go into the business, however, with sufficient capital, so that you will give us loaded trains each way, we will give you a 50-cent rate, or a 40-cent rate, if that is necessary." And a 40-cent rate, I believe, was given.

Mr. President, that was a simple proposition, having for its object the development of the lumber industry of the Pacific coast and the development of the farming industry in my own State.

Under that agreement lumber was carried from the Pacific coast into the Red River Valley at a cost that barely more than paid the cost of running trains one way. Had Minnesota and Wisconsin been given comparatively favorable rates, then all of the forests of Oregon and Washington would have been to-day in their primeval beauty and grandeur. It was by reason of this discrimination that we have been enabled to build up the great lumber industry on the one hand, and that we have been enabled to build up the agricultural section upon the other hand. If we were to take away that discrimination to-day, the discrimination that the West enjoys in the matter of these freights, then all of our prosperity would vanish like frostwork in the morning sun.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon a short question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; though I will be through in a short time.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not like to interrupt a Senator speaking, but I should like, if the Senator can, to have pointed out a single word in the House bill that would enable the Commission to interfere with that condition beyond what they might have interfered with it under the original bill as it stands to-day as a law.

Mr. McCUMBER. One of two things is certain under this bill. Either the Commission will have the power to determine what are just and reasonable rates or it will not have that power. If it has that power, it has got to base its decision upon something. If it bases its decision upon the North Atlantic differential theory that it has promulgated, it will be bound to follow the theory I have suggested. If it bases it upon any other theory, then you would have as many different kinds of reasonable rates as there are railways in the United States.

I know of no system, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota, whereby the Commission can determine what is a reasonable rate without absolutely destroying all the relations of one road to another and bringing about a chaotic condition in transportation, unless it takes into consideration the question what would be reasonable on other roads and what other roads can haul the freight for.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me again, he must concede that before the Commission under the new law can ascertain a reasonable rate the Commission must first be satisfied in condemning the existing rate. The Senator is undoubtedly familiar with the decisions of the Supreme Court in regard to the long and short haul clause of the existing law. I undertake to say that there is not a line, or word, or syllable in this bill which enlarges the power of the Commission as to the long and short haul clause as found in the existing interstate-commerce law. If the Commission would not find those rates unreasonable under the existing law, clearly they could not in the place of those rates substitute an alleged reasonable rate under the proposed law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me come down still closer to the point. I will not give the exact figures, but I will give enough to show the result. I will give a good illustration. We will say that a carload of wheat carried from my city to the Senator's city or Minneapolis, where we marked it, is carried by the roads at $50 per car. Now, that same car is loaded at the same place and carried back to the same city where it started for $100 per car.

This is done under a system which has been adopted by the railways that it is for the best interest of our country; that we get these benefits for the things we ship out rather than the things we ship in; that while we ship out 3,000 bushels of wheat, for instance, if it is but $50 a car, we will receive 5 cents a bushel more than we would upon an equalization of those rates. To be sure, when we ship something in it will cost more. It may cost us 5 cents more for a pitchfork, but while selling 3,000 bushels of wheat we do not buy back 3,000 pitchforks, and hence we are really benefited by this discrimination.

Now, suppose the Interstate Commerce Commission is called upon to decide that the rate from Minneapolis to my town of $100 a car is excessively high, what evidence will they receive? One of the things that would necessarily be submitted is that the railway company hauled the same car the other direction for only $50, and if they can haul it one direction for $50 they can haul it the other direction for $50. They may cut down on the $100 rate, but the chances are if they do cut down on the $100 rate on the ground that it is excessive, the company will make up on the $50 rate, which is the real rate that benefits us, and the only one that amounts to anything to us, and will make it cost all the more to move our products eastward.

Mr. CLAPP. I will ask the Senator if that could not be done under the existing law, provided the Commission could find successfully that the $100 rate is an unreasonable rate? Is there anything in the existing law to prevent the Commission from attacking that rate?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Commission will attack the $100 rate. I am assuming now that they hold that it is unreasonable, and that they hold that instead of the $100 rate they could well afford to carry freight for $75 westward. Now, what is the railway going to do with the other $25? They will probably—

Mr. CLAPP. That is a violation of the existing law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment, Mr. President. They probably will attach it to the eastward haul, because the eastward haul already may be low, and the railway can not afford to carry both ways at a less amount. In other words, they must have $150 for hauling that car both ways. I want to let them have the opportunity to differentiate in favor of the eastward haul, and I would not willingly put it in the hands of the Commission to say that they shall not have that power.

Now, Mr. President, a word before closing. A work half done had better be left undone. Unless this Commission can properly consider everyone of the freights that it will be called upon to consider, it seems to me that we ought not to force it upon them, or even expect them to do it or allow them to do it.

Mr. President, I make no claim to expert knowledge on the subject of railroad rate making. There are, however, a few basic principles relative to the subject which, if not known by every person, are at least understood by those who have given the subject even casual consideration, principles which ought not to be lost sight of. We know, in a general way, how these rates are arrived at. The official charged with the rate-making power on any great line of railway receives daily reports from every station along the line as to condition of crops, business, the amount of produce that will be required to be moved from each station, etc. Not only this, but he receives information directly or indirectly from points along every other railway system. Those lines he must utilize and those which are in competition with his line. He must study the market of the entire nation and the entire world. He must constantly have before him the schedules of charges for all ocean traffic, and the amount of that traffic, because he must fix his rates in accordance with it. He must understand exactly what the variation of a half cent per hundred pounds on any commodity between any points will have upon the rates and charges and business of other lines, as well as his own, so that, in fact, every agent, every employee in every station along every line of railway does his part in imparting information which shall be the basis of fixing rates from day to day. I therefore do not exaggerate when I say that it takes an army of 50,000 men to make railroad rates for the railroads of the United States. Now, we propose to place this extraordinary power in the hands of five men, who, though they be giants in intellect, could not consider the one-hundredth part of 1 per cent of the things which properly should be considered in the matter of rate making.

I judge from the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that if he pays the Commissioners twice as much he will make them twice as intellectual. I will hardly agree with that proposition, Mr. President. I think that though their intellect be gigantic and a thousandfold multiplied they could not consider properly one-quarter of the rates that would naturally come before them, because I believe that as soon as that rate-making power is given it will be followed by applications from nearly every great commercial city to secure lower rates or preferential rates to its own particular locality for the very purpose of securing its own prosperity; and if they are not successful in that way they will get in as defendants for the purpose of preventing some other city from getting the preferentials, and the Commission will be naturally overwhelmed with a great amount of work.

I am informed that there are more than 100,000 schedules of rates filed every year with this Commission. That means 500 for every working day in a year. It means 40 for every working hour. Now, how can we expect a Commission to take into consideration and justly consider every one of these propositions, which must be determined not alone on value, but on a thousand other conditions, such as the inequalities of bonded indebtedness, inequalities of cost of construction, inequalities of a thousand other kinds, which must necessarily be taken into consideration in the matter of fixing and determining even what shall be considered as a fair and reasonable rate.

Mr. President, the Commission have declared a rule that they will follow, and it seems to me that they will be compelled to follow the rules which they have laid down in this North Atlantic differential case.

Mr. President, a word before closing. All who have written about the conditions in the old country agree that granting the rate-making power to any political commission has worked disastrously to every one of those inland cities which did not have the benefit of water transportation. We have no water transportation to amount to anything in this country, and I conceive it would be much worse in this country than in the old. I take just a little excerpt from the testimony of Mr. Meyer, given before the Interstate Commerce Commission. He says:

> The experience of all such countries has been to bring into politics the question of reasonable rates and the great question of conflict of sectional interests, which is an incident necessary to the development of a country; and the ultimate result has been that railway rates have become inelastic and finally have ceased to decline; they have become stationary and have remained so.
> The result of that has been to paralyze commerce to a very large extent, the railways as effective agents for the development of commerce, and the resources of a country; and unless there has been the possibility of escape from that paralysis through a recourse to a means of transportation that was abandoned in this country in the seventies, namely, by river and canal, the effect has been absolutely disastrous.

And, again, he says, speaking of what the result of the German ownership or fixing of rates has been:

> Berlin has lost all its import trade in petroleum, except trade dependent upon petroleum consumed in Bremen and the immediate neighborhood; and the petroleum import trade has gone entirely to Hamburg for eastern Germany, which distributes by means of the Elbe and then the canal from Berlin, and then the Oder.
> On the other hand, for western Germany the petroleum trade has gone entirely to Rotterdam and Mannheim, which is the head of navigation of large vessels on the Rhine, at the point where the Main empties into the Rhine.

And so the hard and fast rules enforced upon railway carriage in the German Empire have had the effect of totally destroying business in some centers and moving it to others, have built up some sections—namely, those with extra facilities for water transportation—and have destroyed those centers which depend wholly upon railway transportation. The like is also true in Australia. The interior is as much a desert to-day as it was a hundred years ago. On the other hand, the whole interior section of our country has been built up, because of the constant endeavor of each line of railway to make the country contiguous to its line prosperous, even at the expense of sinking millions upon millions of dollars in making rates so low that other sections of the country could not for a time compete.

Mr. President, there are about one and one-fourth million voters employed by the railroads of the United States. At present each one of this great army must deal separately with the organization that controls the particular railroad in which he is employed. Some of those railroads, which are operating upon their own systems, upon their own theories, contemplate improvements in one direction, some of them in another direction; and all these matters of expenses and improvements are considered in determining what they can pay their employees; but, now, when you substitute and project this political body into the management of the railways of the country, even to a slight degree, does anyone for a single moment believe that this immense political influence will not make itself felt, first, in demands before this commission for higher wages; second, for shorter hours, and third, for smaller train loads, etc.? If they appeal there in vain, does anybody for a single moment believe that they will not make stupendous power felt in the only body that is back of this great political power—the Congress of the United States? For my part, I say, Mr. President, Heaven pity the nation when it is wholly at the mercy of all the great trusts and of all these political combinations in the United States.

I am informed that when Germany took over the railways from private to public ownership, she foresaw all of these great dangers, and she disfranchised everyone of the employees. That would be contrary to our idea of government, and it could never be done in this country; but it shows that we shall more and more and to a greater extent be subjected to these great political organizations and influences if we once bring the Government down from its lofty function of governing to that of taking part in the business industries of the country.

The bill contains amendments to the old law that will assist in its better enforcement, and I will cheerfully support those provisions. If this other provision, which I believe will be detrimental to all but a few great seaports and possibly some other lines of railway, is adopted, then, in my judgment, both for constitutional reasons and for fair play, I believe the courts should be open, with provisions for speedy determination to all persons interested alike.

Mr. President, since the day of Magna Charta, which insured for all time the right of every man to a fair trial, no principle has been more sacredly cherished or protected by all English-speaking races. While litigation in late years may be slow and often hampered with trivial technicalities, still, when we compare it with trials by departments or boards or courts-martial, its superiority stands out grandly above all other methods of determining the personal or constitutional rights of the citizen. And I, for one, do not believe that the time has come or any condition has arisen which demands the substitution of a political board for a judicial tribunal.

Mr. President, in closing I only want to say one other thing. It has been reiterated here again and again with impassioned declamation that, unless we take this first step toward socialism, the placing of the rate-making power in the hands of a political commission, the people will rise in their majesty and compel us to take another one, and that is government railway ownership; in other words, that if we do not do one great wrong, the people will rise and compel us to do a still greater wrong.

But the people, as a whole, do not want and do not ask their representatives to do anything but right. Whenever the people have understood a subject they have never yet, by their vote, allowed any great wrong to be perpetrated by us, much less perpetrate it themselves. The people not only want their representatives to do the right thing, but they want them to do the right thing in the right way.

Mr. President, I need give but a single illustration of the ability of the people themselves to change their own minds when they have duly considered a matter. I call attention to the great campaign of 1896 between the gold standard and free silver. During that campaign had there been a vote had by the people of the United States during the months of July, August, September, or even in the early part of October, the advocates of the gold standard would have gone down to destruction before an avalanche of American votes. Our schoolhouses throughout the entire country, devoted to the education of youth during the day, were given up in the evenings for the education of bearded men. We were told at that time that our silver money had been surreptitiously demonetized some years before, that there would be necessarily a great contraction of the currency to the benefit of the wealthy people of the country and to the detriment of the poor. They fought it out in argument; and on that day of November when the question was determined the people of the United States completely changed their first conclusion; and they did the best thing, Mr. President, that was ever done in this country, for if we had adhered to that policy, notwithstanding all of the savings and all the great accumulation of gold since that time and the wealth which the mines have developed, our money would not have been worth more than 40 cents on the dollar in its purchasing value as compared with what it is to-day.

So, Mr. President, I have confidence that the people are not themselves insisting that we shall surrender our own judgment upon any particular phase of this case. I am sincere in my belief that that portion of the bill which changes the rate-making power from the railways to a political body will be to the detriment of the people, and I do not feel that I am acting against the interest of those people. I would be perfectly willing to submit that question wherever it may be justly and fairly heard.

I am afraid that we are substituting the press for the people in this case. I am not so certain, the matter never having gone to the people, that they will say that out of all the remedies there is one, and only one, that the Congress can conscientiously and honestly consider.

What the people want are results. They want a law that will go directly to the evil, and then they want that law enforced. They do not want the enactment of a new law which will not touch the wrong. They want a law that all rates shall be just and reasonable. They want a law that no preferences will be given to the great shipper over the small shipper. They want a law that the owners of special cars shall not have such privileges as will enable them to drive out of business concerns so small that they can not afford to manufacture their own special cars. They want a law that no rebates of any character shall be allowed any person whereby he gains an advantage over others. In a nutshell, they want simple justice and fair play. And I believe that they want another thing which the press have forgotten to agitate. The people in business, representing all characters of enterprise, are compelled to compete in the open markets of the world and against immense business interests. They therefore have a right to demand, and do demand, that the railways which carry their products shall also be compelled to compete for them; and they want no law which will allow a commission, through the rate-making power, to destroy that competition.

I have very little fear of the result this will have upon the railways themselves. I do not believe they will be greatly injured. I believe that rule will be applied which was applied in the North Atlantic differential case. I believe that the Commission will see to it that they in their determination of reasonable rates will not destroy any railway if they can help it. But I am interested in what is going to be the final result upon the great interior of this country, the exact center of which I myself represent. While I am here, Mr. President, I purpose to vote according to my own judgment. I do not think the editors who have written up this question in lurid lines have given it the study that I have; I do not think they have given it the consideration that any one of the Senators here present has given it. I simply ask that in its consideration, instead of always putting our ear to the ground to get the public sentiment for the sole purpose of ascertaining which way the wind is blowing that it may blow us safely into a political port, that we shall put our ear to the ground and keep it there to hear the complaints that are being made by the people; then study all those complaints, and, under our obligations as Senators, before God do our duty according to the best of our information and our judgment in remedying the complaints.

Mr. President, I want to say finally that I will not be a party in deceiving the people into a belief that in their battle against these great combinations, the source of all their real injuries, they are going to get any remedy in this bill that will amount to anything in whatever way we may pass it.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish the Senator would withhold that motion for a moment.

Mr. KEAN. I will.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to request that there be printed for the use of the Senate in parallel columns the interstate commerce law and the proposed law—the law of 1887 as amended by the law of 1889, in one column, and the proposed law in a parallel column opposite the sections which it is intended to amend, and that after these the Elkins law be printed, so that the Senate may have immediately at hand just what exists and precisely what is proposed, in order that the matter may be seen at a glance.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to the request of the Senator.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that the compilation likewise include all the pending amendments which have been proposed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I had considered that, but I think it would make the document too bulky. I had thought that we could take the proposed amendments and lay them side by side in two parallel columns. My proposition is that the law of 1887, as amended by the law of 1889, which is the existing interstate commerce law, shall be printed in one column and the proposed law in the other column opposite the sections which it is proposed to amend, and that after those two the Elkins law be printed.

Mr. KEAN. There is a print of that kind in existence at the present time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Indiana wants the matter in parallel columns.

Mr. KEAN. There is a copy in my committee room.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The print as it now exists is very, very difficult to get at. You have to cut the laws out and paste them upon paper. What I propose is that we shall have a document containing the existing law and the proposed law in parallel columns, so that it can be seen at a glance.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to the Senator's request, but I will furnish him with a copy made up in that way.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It does not exist.

Mr. KEAN. I have one in my committee room, I will say to the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none; and that order is made.

FREE TRANSPORTATION ON RAILROADS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] introduced an amendment to the railroad rate bill yesterday afternoon, about which we had some discussion in regard to the free-pass evil, I desire to introduce and to ask the Senate to consider and pass a resolution which I send to the desk, calling for information from the Interstate Commerce Commission on that subject. It will take only a few minutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina submits a resolution, which, in the absence of objection, will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate all information in the possession of the Commission showing that any railroad companies of the country engaged in interstate commerce, are in the habit of receiving payment for the transportation of passengers not in cash paid for tickets, but in services rendered under some form of prior agreement between the railroads and the individuals or corporations using the transportation.

and particularly all information showing that a custom has existed or exists on the part of the railroad companies of entering into advertising contracts with the proprietors of newspapers and other publications under which free passes or passage tickets or mileage books are furnished to such proprietors and charged to their account, to be paid for by publishing for the railroads their time tables, notices of excursions, descriptions of scenery, and other miscellaneous reading matter, which publishing is charged to the account of the railroads, so that a system of running accounts, to be adjusted at convenience, is established between the railroads and the proprietors of the newspapers and other publications; and, further, to inform the Senate to what extent such custom of not collecting payments for passenger fares in money and of keeping running accounts has prevailed or now prevails between the railroads and the proprietors of newspapers and other publications, and whether such customs are contrary to the interstate commerce law, and whether any proceedings have been at any time taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission in respect to such customs, and also to report to the Senate the reports and opinions of the Commission in all cases concerning such customs which have been heretofore examined and considered or are still pending and undecided in whole or in part, together with the reasons for any delay that has taken place in any such cases, and the reasons for any failures on the part of the Commission to investigate and deal with any illegalities in connection with passenger transportation which may have come to the knowledge of the Commission.

Mr. KEAN. Let that resolution go over until to-morrow morning, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the resolution will lie over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 28, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate, March 27, 1906.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 27, 1906.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, who madest us to think, to will, to act, to do things, help us to think right, to choose right, to do right, that we may thus adjust ourselves to the eternal laws which environ us, that as individuals and as a nation move on to larger achievements.

Be graciously near to the Member whose companion has been taken by the Angel of Death to a larger life. Let Thine everlasting arms be about him to comfort and sustain, and help us all to realize that death is not an extinction of being, but an epoch, an event, in the grand eternal march of existence, and Thine be the praise through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE PATTERSON, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. SAMUEL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following order and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, the 15th day of April, 1906, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. GILBERT R. PATTERSON, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, said services to be held immediately following the services to be held in honor of the memory of Hon. BENJAMIN F. MARSH, Hon. JOHN M. PINCKNEY, and Hon. GEORGE A. CASTOR.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The order was agreed to.

STEPHEN B. HOPKINS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 6216) to grant an increase of pension to Stephen B. Hopkins, with a Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WEBBER, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence, for ten days, on account of death in the family.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee appointment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Committee on Military Affairs, Mr. JAMES F. BURKE, of Pennsylvania.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 17359) making appropriations to supply additional deficiencies.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. OLCOTT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 17359, making appropriations to supply additional deficiencies.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, the urgent deficiency bill presented for the consideration of the committee contains but six items. Four carry appropriation to the amount of $136,-016.42, and two call for the diversion of $85,000 of appropriation from certain funds to other purposes. The first item is concerned with the expenses of the Third International Conference of American States, to be held in Rio de Janeiro on the 21st day of July this year. The committee will bear in mind that the first of these international conferences took place here in the city of Washington in 1889. That conference was authorized by statute, and appropriations to the amount of $189,750 were made for that purpose. Among its results was the establishment of the Bureau of American Republics. The second conference, which was provided for in the sundry civil bill of 1901, carried an appropriation of $25,000. That conference was held in the City of Mexico. The $25,000 appropriated was not sufficient for the purpose, so the State Department drew upon the emergency fund in the diplomatic service for an additional amount of $8,000. From the financial standpoint I will say that there were a number of very wealthy men appointed delegates to that conference, who personally paid much of the expenditure out of their own pockets. The result of that conference was in particular the establishment of the International Sanitary Bureau. That International Sanitary Bureau has held two conventions and a treaty has been formulated ad referendum, which, if ratified, will, I believe, go far toward eradicating yellow fever and the other plagues originating in these southern countries. This second conference charged the governing board of the Bureau of American Republics with the duty of fixing the time and place of a third conference, to be held within five years thereafter. That third conference, as stated, is called for the coming summer. All the States of the American Continent, with the exception of three, have joined in this conference. The three are Santo Domingo and Colombia (which, just at present, are in disturbed conditions) and Venezuela. Venezuela at first invited the congress to be held at Caracas, but since it was determined to hold it at Rio has not signified its intention to join. Now, I can best state in the words of the Secretary of State the particular benefit of this conference. He says:

> I think that the work of the Bureau of American Republics, the existence of the international union, and the holding of these conferences afford all together the best means of breaking up the comparative isolation of this country from the other countries of America and establishing relations between us and them in place of the relations—the rather exclusive relations—that have existed hitherto between them and Europe.
> Our relation with them has been largely a political relation, while, on the other hand, their racial ties of race and language and inherited customs and habits—the relations of which have come from the investment of great amounts of European capital in their country, which have come from the establishment of numerous and convenient lines of communication between them and Europe—have made the whole trend of South American trade and social relations and personal relations setsast with Europe rather than with the United States. So that, while we occupy the political attitude of warning Europe off the premises in Central and South America under the Monroe doctrine, we are comparatively strangers to them, and the Europeans hold direct relations with them.

We were at first asked for an appropriation of $100,000 for this purpose. The Secretary of State declared that $60,000, in his opinion, would be sufficient to carry out the programme. We believe that an ample amount should be provided in order that rich men need not be appointed delegates. These delegates serve without any compensation, and this appropriation simply takes care of the necessary expenses.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman believe that the relations between the United States and the Central and South American republics will ever be entirely cordial until that principle of political development which we call the "Monroe doctrine" is better defined and understood? Does it not bring about some degree of irritation?

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe there has been a decided degree of irritation because in their opinion it seems we have established this doctrine for the purpose of perhaps gathering them into our union some day, and then there are many other prejudices against us which a closer intercourse ought to dissipate.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the holding of these conventions tend toward assuring them of the altogether disinterested attitude of this Republic toward the South American republics?

Mr. LITTAUER. It seems to me that these conventions, together with the results achieved by the Bureau of American Republics, will do much to bring that about.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have felt, in common with most of the citizens of the country, that the attitude of this Government might be, and perhaps was, construed by the South American republics particularly as a position of guardianship in a way, and that their pride was humiliated to some extent on account of the assumption of political control in a large sense by this Government over their actions and relations with foreign countries. I hope this convention will tend toward ameliorating these conditions and toning down that feeling of hostility that may have been generated.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me it will unquestionably act in that way, and that the time has now come when the citizens of the United States have reached a point when they desire to take a greater interest, at least an interest of investing capital more and more in the Central and South American countries, and that the statesmen and citizens of these countries have shown a greater interest in our institutions and a desire to get in touch with us and thus promote commercial and social intercourse.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. How are our treaties observed generally in the South American republics? Are the rights of American citizens and property pretty generally respected?

Mr. LITTAUER. I think in the more stable countries, yes. There are others, perhaps, that have not been quite as careful in the treatment of our citizens as they should be. I also want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that there is no authorization of law for this appropriation unless the action of the second Congress in calling this third one may be so construed; but the State Department has acted as though the purpose of Congress, as previously demonstrated, would be continued, and I trust this appropriation may be made without objection.

The next item concerns the joint resolution approved on March 7 for examination into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies in coal and oil.

The committee will bear in mind that this joint resolution calls for a very wide investigation—an investigation whether common carriers and their agents have any interest in coal lands and properties or in oil lands; whether the officers of any of the carrier companies are interested directly or indirectly by means of stock ownership in corporations or companies owning coal or oil properties; and whether there is any contract, any combination, any conspiracy in restraint of trade to which these companies are parties in interest; whether they can find any facts as to the effect of such relationship upon persons engaged independently, and, finally, whether the system of the supply and distribution of cars has affected these independent distributors adversely.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, Congress made an appropriation of a hundred thousand dollars for this purpose for many weeks ago.

Mr. LITTAUER. No; there was no appropriation accompanying that joint resolution. We now seek to appropriate to carry into effect this joint resolution.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I remember the appropriation was omitted; I had forgotten it.

Mr. LITTAUER. It was omitted designedly. The Interstate Commerce Commission advises us that its regular funds will not be sufficient to carry on this work. The resolution declared that it should immediately investigate, and consequently they came to us with an urgent deficiency estimate for an appropriation of $45,000. They declared very plainly they are not in possession of any facts which will enable them to come to any proper estimate; that they can only guess, so to speak, at what the expense will be.

Mr. OLMSTED. How much did they guess?

Mr. LITTAUER. They estimated $45,000, stating clearly that that amount of money is as good a guess as they can give, because, as the field is entirely new, it will lead into a wide investigation. They say, "We do not know what the expense will be." I hope that the amount to be paid will not be half that. If the appropriation of this money means the spending of all of it, it is a deplorable state of affairs, but it is not necessary that it should be so; the Commission simply wants to have money to begin the investigation and determine what will be needed for the next fiscal year, for which appropriation will be made on the sundry civil bill, and which, in all probability, will be a very substantial sum.

Mr. OLMSTED. I notice they contemplate spending $25,000 for the employment of counsel alone.

Mr. LITTAUER. No; that is a mistake, and if you will permit me I will refer to that in a moment. The Commission gives a statement of the estimate, which includes clerical services, the compensation to attorneys, to high-grade accountants, special agents, clerical services, stenographers, and others necessary. Now, they ask for this $45,000, but as the right granted them in their usual annual appropriation limits the expenditure for counsel to $25,000, they ask that that limit of expendi-tion for the engagement of counsel be extended to $45,000, which would enable them to spend $20,000 out of the $45,000 of the proposed appropriation for the engagement of counsel.

Mr. OLMSTED. What are the lawyers to do—investigate for the Commission?

Mr. LITTAUER. The lawyers are to investigate for the Commission.

Mr. MAHON. Why do not they do it themselves?

Mr. LITTAUER. I think they have plenty of work outside of this investigation.

Mr. OLMSTED. What I want to ask, Mr. Chairman, is whether, in the opinion of the gentleman in charge of the bill, it would not be better and cheaper for us to revoke the entire resolution and pass a different resolution providing for an investigation by a joint committee of Senators and Members, who would not need to employ lawyers to assist them in the investigation, who could do it at about one-third of the expense and perhaps more effectively.

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, I do not want to pass an opinion upon the action of Congress authorizing this joint resolution. I want to pass this bill. Now, the committee will notice that the proposal of the submission here is that this $45,000 be drawn from the balance of appropriations now available for the enforcement of antitrust laws. We appropriated on March 2, 1903, $500,000 for the enforcement of antitrust legislation. Of that amount, after nearly three years have passed (up to January 16, 1906), only $120,682.34 has been used, leaving a balance of nearly $380,000 idle in the Treasury. We felt that the purpose of this resolution was in the line of antitrust enforcement, and consequently our purpose here is not to appropriate $45,000, but divert $45,000 from that large balance of $380,000 to be used for this purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Twenty thousand dollars to be used as counsel fees?

Mr. LITTAUER. Twenty thousand dollars of which may be used as counsel fees. That is the purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman a question about the next clause, if he will yield.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I see in the last six lines, in that part of the bill providing in regard to employees, that clerks and stenographers are taken out.

Mr. LITTAUER. We felt that the clerks and stenographers that are to be employed should be under civil-service regulations. The employment of attorneys is exempt from civil-service regulations; and accountants—the high grade of accountants needed in this work—might be considered clerical, and consequently we want to exempt them and also special agents who may be required, while simple clerical service—clerks and stenographers, running from $900 to $1,800 in compensation—ought to come in in the regular way.

If there are no other questions, I will pass on to the item concerning the District of Columbia. This item is for the collection and disposal of garbage. Contracts for this purpose are entered into every five years. The contract for the last five years, which expired in part last August and in part last December, amounted to $106,519 yearly. The yearly appropriations were $115,000, but the balance was used for ordinary clerical service, which practice we put a stop to in the appropriation bill of last year. The new yearly contract amounts to $107,700.30, or practically an increase of $60,000 in the contract for the coming five years over the contract now just expired. These contracts have been entered into according to law, after advertisement, and it is simply for us to provide here for this shortage, which arises because in the sundry civil bill of last year only $100,000 was appropriated, the amount needed not being then known. The auditor of the District of Columbia has figured out the new contracts and declares he will need $46,646.42 to pay for the service up to the 1st of next July.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman what is done with the garbage here. Is it sold, or what goes with it?

Mr. LITTAUER. The garbage is gathered by the contractor, who transports it about 40 miles down into Maryland, and there disposes of it. We pay him now, under contract, $78,400 a year for taking this garbage away.

Mr. SIMS. Is not that garbage sold by the contractor?

Mr. LITTAUER. Why, of course. If he could not sell it, he could not afford to contract. We pay him $78,400 to dispose of the garbage.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a fact that this garbage can be sold for enough money to supply revenue sufficient to pay for its removal?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not believe it can.

Mr. SIMS. Is that not done in New York?

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, no; New York has a large expense in connection with garbage. They do get some use of it through a reduction plant where they develop power used in electric lighting and the like.

Mr. SIMS. How much do we pay under this contract?

Mr. LITTAUER. We pay $78,400 to the contractor for collecting the garbage and disposing of it.

Mr. SIMS. And actually give it away besides?

Mr. LITTAUER. We give it away, and pay that in addition.

Mr. SIMS. And pay the company for taking it?

Mr. LITTAUER. Seventy-eight thousand four hundred dollars a year.

Mr. SIMS. Has the committee ever investigated whether or not it can be sold for something?

Mr. LITTAUER. The committee has only investigated that the Commissioners of the District have entered into these contracts according to law. The law describes the plan as to how these contracts should be let, and they have been let according to law, and consequently it is our purpose to provide the necessary appropriation for carrying out this law.

Mr. SIMS. The garbage is increasing all the time, as the city grows——

Mr. LITTAUER. All the time it is growing, and the contract price is increasing.

Mr. SIMS. It is of great utility to the fertilizer company that gets it; would it not be a good thing to have an inquiry by your committee, and some way ascertain whether this garbage can be sold instead of being an annual expense to the District which is constantly increasing?

Mr. LITTAUER. I should like to call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that the contract which just expired, which was entered into five years ago, provided for an annual payment to the contractor of $51,600. When this item was advertised for this year, two bids were received, one of them at $78,400, and the other one at $108,000.

Mr. SIMS. And a contract was entered into for five years again?

Mr. LITTAUER. For five years again, showing that the increased work would require an increased sum to be paid, on top of the privilege of using the garbage for their own purposes.

Mr. SIMS. And the gentleman, no doubt, has a lingering idea somewhere in his mind that these two bidders did not bid very viciously against each other.

Mr. LITTAUER. All I can say is that the increase was an enormous one, and that directed our attention to the inquiry, "Why this increase?" We were met by the answer that the company that has been doing this work for the last five years has continually declared that it was losing money, and in consequence the work was done in a poorer and continually poorer fashion, because money was being lost. When the bids were opened this year, instead of $51,000 there were two bids, for $78,000 and $108,000, respectively.

Mr. PALMER. Is it not up to the District Committee to make an investigation?

Mr. LITTAUER. I have no doubt the District Committee reported the bill on which this law was founded.

Mr. SIMS. When the bill was before the House the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] made a statement as to the conditions in New York City, and he stated that they absolutely sold the garbage there and got a profit out of it, but it did not seem to interest anybody. We went over to the other end and tried to have an investigation instituted, but nothing resulted from it.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is the District Committee you have got to encourage in order to have that matter thrashed out.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will say to the gentleman that when we prepared this bill we endeavored to ascertain if that garbage could not be sold instead of given away, but we could get no information at all out of the Commission in that direction, and we had to drop it.

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not believe that any city in the United States gets any money out of its refuse. I believe its disposal is an expense.

Mr. SIMS. It is an expense, it is true, but the company that gets it certainly does make big money out of it. Would they not pay something for it?

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe they would not, and I believe we must pay them in order to remove it.

Mr. SIMS. I do not mean the expense of removal, but the company that buys it.

Mr. LITTAUER. The balance of the cost of removal is much greater than the $78,000 that we are paying for it. If something was not realized from the sale of refuse, the expense of removal to the District would be very much greater than it is now. Carts are compelled to go from house to house on every street and alley in this District of Columbia, gathering up this refuse.

Mr. SIMS. I believe there is an enormous profit involved in this for somebody.

Mr. LITTAUER. If so, why does not the gentleman present the facts to show it?

Mr. SIMS. I think we will take steps to show it. The contract has been let for five years, and it is now too late to do anything to affect that contract, but I hope we shall be able to get some investigation now.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, the next item concerns the miscellaneous expenses of this House. The estimate last year for our miscellaneous expenses was $80,000. We reported an appropriation of $45,000, and limited the expenditure for miscellaneous items by the words "exclusive of salaries and labor."

Early in this session we found that we had to qualify that limitation by adding "unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives," which means that since the beginning of this session the miscellaneous fund has been charged with the salaries in connection with the many resolutions passed. The sum of $45,000 was appropriated; $25,000 additional is now asked, a total of $70,000—less than the average sum appropriated for the last five or six years, which has run $80,000, $90,000, $70,000, $75,000, and for the last year $75,000.

I find in a statement that has been prepared for me that of the total of $70,000 which will become available when this appropriation may go into effect, $66,800 have already either been paid out or contracted for in the way of salaries to become due. There is an extraordinary expense of $8,000 in connection with the Joint Committee on Printing, which reported yesterday. Then we come to the item of $5,000 for fuel and oil for heating purposes. All we can say in regard to this sum is that the present appropriation has been exhausted. The Senate for doing the same work makes an appropriation of $25,000; we have been getting along with $15,000 with an occasional deficiency. The Clerk reports that this fund is now exhausted. The last item is in reference to the leave of absence fund at the Government Printing Office. Gentlemen will bear in mind that those who work in the Government Printing Office have under statute a right to thirty days' annual leave. For this purpose in 1904 there were expended $331,000 and in 1905 $344,000. For the current year an appropriation was made of $325,000, of which, on the 21st day of March, $308,000 had already been expended, leaving a balance of $16,412.18. At the rate at which this fund has been drawn on, the Public Printer estimates that $40,000 will be required to pay for the leaves of absence allowed by law until June 30 next.

Mr. PERKINS. Is not that a larger amount than was allowed last year?

Mr. LITTAUER. The amount allowed last year was $360,000, of which $344,980.60 was used.

Mr. PERKINS. How much was used this year?

Mr. LITTAUER. So far $308,000 has been used, and the Public Printer estimates the total expenditure will come within $365,000, or it may be $350,000; he can not tell exactly. The work at the Government Printing Office, according to the amount of labor paid for, is about as much during the past year as ever. These annual leaves are a complicated kind of calculation. The Public Printer practically states to us that he does not know anything about it himself. I asked him, "How is the calculation made; how do you handle the leaves of absence account?" Mr. Stillings answered, "It seems to me it has been more or less guesswork."

The Public Printer described this matter of annual leaves, and it appears that one working at the Public Printing Office has to work there a year before they figure that he is entitled to thirty days' leave of absence, which must be taken during the annual year. Therefore the leaves we are paying for now are leaves of absence in connection with the work done the year past. Again he stated to us that the appropriation for printing for the present fiscal year was more than sufficient, and that if we would simply transfer $40,000 of that fund to the leave of absence fund, which funds are kept entirely separate, it would meet the purpose.

Mr. PERKINS. In other words, there is a reduction in the expense of the annual printing itself?

Mr. LITTAUER. I don't think you can tell that until the year is ended. There is a great deal of work connected with Congress, but less work connected with the Departments.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Does the gentleman think that in all probability, after transferring this from the general fund, there will be a demand for a deficiency appropriation in that fund?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not think so. The Public Printer is positive that there is more than ample provision for printing this year and that the transfer is absolutely warranted.

Mr. PALMER. What is the entire cost of the leaves of absence?

Mr. LITTAUER. Last year it was $344,000. This year it will be about the same—between $340,000 and $365,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the bill.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

To meet the actual and necessary expenses of the delegates of the United States to the Third International Conference of American States to be held at the city of Rio de Janeiro, beginning on the 21st day of July, 1906, and of their salaried clerical assistants, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of State, and to continue available during the fiscal year 1907, $60,000.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As acting chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I wish to call the attention of the House to the importance of this appropriation. This is to carry into effect the Pan-American scheme that was introduced by one of the greatest Secretaries of State that our country ever possessed—James G. Blaine. It was done to draw into closer affiliation the South American states with the Republic of the North, both in regard to the diplomatic relations and in regard to our commercial intercourse. I regret to say that owing to a lack of interest, partly, and to unforeseen circumstances the progress has not been made, either diplomatically or commercially, which was greatly to be desired. I am glad to say that the present Secretary of State is inaugurating this new movement to draw us closer together to our South American republics. Of the necessity of this it is hardly necessary to speak. There is no doubt a feeling of some unrest among our South American sisters that there is a disposition on the part of the more powerful Republic of the North to override and oversee, so to speak, their affairs. It is to allay this fear on their part that this has been called in a very large degree, but more important than that, Mr. Chairman, a great part of this is to develop our commercial relations with South America. There is a great deal being said now about the expansion of our trade in the Far East, but, in my judgment, there lies a field for the expansion of our commerce right to the south of us, inhabited by people already educated to the use of the articles that we produce. Yet our commerce with the great continent to the south of us constitutes but a very small portion of our exports. The opportunity is there; it only needs development. Blaine sought twenty years ago and called a Pan-American convention in 1890 to develop these great ideas. It was one of the brightest and most important projects that have been promulgated in the history of our country. For this reason this new conference assumes a value and proportion of importance which I hope will reflect not only in developing those amicable relations so devoutly to be wished between all the great republics that are centered in this Western Hemisphere, but also to develop the commerce which we are now seeking to develop throughout all the world, and to give opportunity for the increase of our export trade to these countries which, with the institution of proper facilities of transportation, lies open for the benefit and increase of our commerce. I trust that there will be no opposition to this.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, is there any connection between this conference and the consular service, I would ask the gentleman?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. None whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. It is entirely distinct and operates along different lines?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Yes; entirely. The conference relates to diplomatic relations and commercial development.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understand that the consular service has some connection with the development of commercial ideas.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is quite correct. The consular service is most efficient in developing our trade, but it will not play any part in this conference, because it is limited to diplomatic and commercial relations.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would like to inquire in what manner these delegates will be able to promote better commercial relations between the United States and other American states or to assist in promoting better relations?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. In this way: In the first place they will draw more cordial diplomatic relations. As I have already stated, there is undoubtedly a prevailing sentiment in of the South American countries that the greater Republic to the North desires, in an undue degree, to interfere in their affairs. The recent great discussion respecting the Monroe doctrine has called the attention of the South American countries to that fact. It is to allay any such fear on their part that even our Secretary of State is going to do something that heretofore has not been done, and visit this conference and have personal intercourse with the foreign representatives of the other republics, to allay any such fear, and to let them understand exactly the cordial intentions of our country toward them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given two minutes more, so that I may ask him another question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be extended for two minutes. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has explained that we are to get better trade relations by making the South American republics understand that the United States is not to descend upon them.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Not at all. The gentleman can not put any such language into my mouth or any such idea into my head.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Perhaps I can not put such ideas into the gentleman's head.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. And he can not misquote me.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would not attempt to do either. Now, will the gentleman tell me in what manner the delegates may directly promote better commercial relations, leaving aside the question of the Monroe doctrine?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I will answer that very readily. There are all sorts of trade conditions that exist between different countries. The result of the first Pan-American conference was the establishment of the South American Bureau here, which furnishes information to all the countries and to our merchants of what is needed in those countries, the facilities for transportation, etc. That was the practical result of the first. Now, then, they can also develop those ideas. They can take up the question of transportation, they can take up the question of reciprocity, they can take up the question of taxes on imports and exports relating to different countries, and all those questions that will redound to the mutual benefit of the different republics.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Has our commerce with South American states increased since the last Pan-American conference?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. It has increased, but nothing like the amount that is desirable, and for this reason: The very lack of transportation facilities and mail facilities between this country and South America, and the great argument for the shipping bill is that it will tend more to develop that trade than any other feature that could possibly be passed by this House, and I hope the House in its wisdom and justice will take up that bill and pass it.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Then the only possibility of getting trade relations is by passing a shipsubsidy bill?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I never said that.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. In what other way can you promote general trade relations?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. By considering the question of taxation on exports and imports between the countries and—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, may have fifteen minutes, as I prefer that to having a general discussion on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi may have fifteen minutes additional time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the Fifty-ninth Congress is "making history." It is making history slowly in so far as legislation is concerned and making history very rapidly in so far as "standing pat" on old abuses is concerned. This morning I saw in the Washington Post a letter from the Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE, of the State of New York, majority floor leader of this honorable body and chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. The reply is very properly headed, "PAYNE shatters all hope for a revision of tariff." I am going to insert in the RECORD, and ask unanimous consent now to do it, so as to avoid abusing the patience and consuming the time of the House, the letter from Mr. MCCALL to Mr. PAYNE and Mr. PAYNE'S reply to Mr. MCCALL. I ask that unanimous consent now, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to insert the two letters to which he has referred in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letters referred to are as follows:

PAYNE SHATTERS ALL HOPE FOR A REVISION OF TARIFF—CHAIRMAN OF THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS IN LETTER TO REPRESENTATIVE MCCALL, OF MASSACHUSETTS, DECLARES IT WILL NOT BE DONE BY THIS CONGRESS.

Hope of possible tariff revision by the Fifty-ninth Congress has been shattered by SERENO E. PAYNE, chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means.

This blasting of the desires of the revisionists did not come in the heat of debate or during the discussion of the subject across the committee-room table.

In a formal, carefully prepared letter, in which every word was studied and selected to make his position absolutely and bluntly plain, Mr. PAYNE, who in this case stands for the Speaker of the House, issues his final pronouncement against tariff revision.

This appeal for the redemption of the promises made by the party in its national conventions came to Chairman PAYNE from S. W. MCCALL, representing the Eighth Massachusetts district, who was chosen by the delegation from that State to present the matter to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MCCALL puts great stress upon the fact that conditions have so changed as to demand revision of the rates imposed by the Dingley bill nine years ago.

Chairman PAYNE in replying, reiterates his sympathy with the utterances of the Republican national platform, but denies that conditions have so changed as to require the fulfillment of the promises of the platform. He asserts that a majority of the House does not believe there should be any change in tariff schedules, although he admits the existence of groups here and there who want some sort of revision.

While declaring the views expressed in his letter to be his individual opinion, Mr. PAYNE says he has reason to believe he represents the sentiment of a decided majority of the committee in refusing to entertain the appeal of the Massachusetts people.

These two letters constitute an interesting chapter to the history the Fifty-ninth Congress is now making, and are as follows:

MCCALL'S LETTER TO PAYNE.

MAY 21, 1906.

Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. PAYNE: Referring to our conversations concerning a revision of the tariff, I desire to bring to your attention, for the purpose of making clear the attitude of the Republican Members of the Massachusetts delegation, the declaration of the platform of the Massachusetts Republicans, adopted by their State convention on the 6th of last October.

After pronouncing adherence to the policy of protection, and opposition to "tariff changes tending to depress or destroy any of our industries, or to lower the wages of American labor," the platform urged the Senators and Representatives from Massachusetts to "continue to press upon their party associates in Congress from other States the wisdom of a consideration of the tariff for the purpose of revision and readjustment." This declaration was at least not inconsistent with the last national Republican platform, which, referring to the tariff, declared that "rates of duty should be readjusted only when conditions have so changed that the public interest demands their alteration," and that "to a Republican Congress and a Republican President this great question can safely be intrusted."

The country voted to intrust the question to a Republican President and a Congress strongly Republican in both Houses. If revision is not to be considered at the present session, it is extremely unlikely that it will be accorded during the life of the present Congress, for the next session will be so short as to suffice for little more than the passage of the appropriation bills. On behalf, therefore, of the Republican Members from Massachusetts, who believe that nothing can more endanger the enforcement of the existing rates "than a general belief that the public interest demands their alteration," and who, at a meeting delegated me to make the request, I ask consideration of the tariff by the Committee on Ways and Means, with a view to its revision and readjustment.

Sincerely, yours,

S. W. MCCALL.

PAYNE'S REPLY TO MCCALL.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 24, 1906.

Hon. S. W. MCCALL, M. C., House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MCCALL: Yours of the 21st instant reached me last evening. You refer me to the deliverance of the Massachusetts platform and also of the national Republican platform. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the announcement in the several platforms that rates of duty should be readjusted only when conditions have so changed that the public interest demands their alteration. I am now personally satisfied for myself as to whether the conditions presently existing have changed to such an extent as demands a change in tariff rates. This question can only be answered prudently by the concurrent view of the majority of the party in power and responsible for legislation. While there are groups in Massachusetts of the House who believe that a few changes should be made, and also another group or groups who believe the changes demanded by them are comparatively unimportant, but that the tariff should be considered in regard to other items in the schedules, I think you will agree with me that a majority of the Republicans in the House do not consider it the case that there should be a general revision of the tariff.

While there is a minority of Republican Members who consider that the tariff should be amended in some few items, there is also a sizable minority who believe that any effort to change the tariff should be entered upon at the present session of Congress.

Our people have not forgotten the dishonest, but plausible, claims that were made by our opponent at the election in 1890, following within a month the final passage of the McKinley bill, and the unfortunate results of that election. The resulting change of policies was especially disastrous to the business and labor interests of the country through the years that followed. Surely we ought not to repeat that experiment in the year 1906.

Congress is not prepared to review the tariff schedules in that calm, judicial frame of mind so necessary to the proper preparation of a tariff act at a time so near the coming Congressional elections. The Dingley bill was the most successful ever enacted. Its practical results were so evident to the country during the eighteen months that elapsed between its passage and the next election that the people have continued the policy of that bill to the present day. It would be unfortunate should any precipitate action in the future result in a temporary reversal of the policy of protection in the United States.

While it is true that some improvement could well be made in the rates under the Dingley bill, it was probably as free from defects at the time of its passage as any new law which could now be enacted. During the nine years of its operation the country has enjoyed prosperity unparalleled—a prosperity which at the present time is simply marvelous. We may well hesitate to take any chance of interrupting the business of the country by a general revision of the tariff, and we should never enter upon it until we are satisfied that such a revision will accomplish results far outweighing any well-grounded apprehension of business depression and consequent evil results which would come even temporarily from such revision.

I can not, therefore, agree with your delegation that it would be best at the present session of Congress to enter upon a consideration of the tariff with a view to its revision and readjustment. While this is my individual opinion, I have reason to believe that it is also the judgment of a decided majority of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Sincerely, yours,

SERENO E. PAYNE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now for a few words of comment upon the reply made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. The original letter of Mr. MCCALL needs no comment. It is so concise, brief, plain, and to the point that it speaks for itself all the way through. The reply requires a little bit of note. Not so awfully much note, because it is a novelty. We have all known for a long time that the coterie which was controlling this House had made up its mind that there should be no revision of the tariff in any particular whatsoever, no matter how urgent. Massachusetts, forgetting her historic dignity, has been actually howling—think of the inappropriateness generally of the word "howling" in connection with the dignified name "Massachusetts"—but Massachusetts lately has been actually howling for some sort of reformation of the tariff in those particulars in which the tariff is a shoe which pinches her foot, and she appeals to the majority leader of this floor for some sort of sympathy. She asks for bread, and she gets a stone.

Mr. Chairman, I find in the letter of the gentleman from New York to the gentleman from Massachusetts this language:

> Congress is not prepared to review the tariff schedules in that calm, judicial frame of mind so necessary to the proper preparation of a tariff act at a time so near the coming Congressional elections.

The gentleman from New York gives as a reason, then, for not revising the tariff the proximity of a Congressional election and the lack on his side of the Chamber of "calm and judicial frames of mind." I have suspected for a long time that there was no calm and judicial framing of mind upon the Republican side in connection with the tariff, but that about the only calm and judicial framing there was was the calm and judicial and deliberate framing of the tariff itself by the fellows who were benefited by its robberies. I had already concluded that the only function the Republican majority performed in connection with "framing" of any sort was to take orders from the fellows who were benefited by the tariff, upon the general fallacious notion that the tariff ought to be framed in the interest of the producer, and in the interest of the producer alone, forgetting altogether that all men are consumers at the same time that they are producers, and that the tariff ought to be framed in the interest of the producer and consumer alike. Then I find below a warning from the gentleman from New York. "It would be unfortunate," said he, "should any precipitate action in the future"—not in the present, but in the future—"result in a temporary reversal of the policy of protection in the United States." Talking about precipitate action upon the part of the Republican majority in this Fifty-ninth Congress upon tariff questions reminds me very much of the fellow who begged the other fellow not to leave after they had been playing poker for forty-eight hours, wording his appeal in these touching words: "Old fellow, do not break up the crowd all of a sudden."

As far as I can learn, there will be no "precipitate action," and there will be no action of any sort; there will be no "calm judicial action" of this Republican party even after having adopted in national convention a platform, whereupon, under false pretenses, they carried the last election, stating that the tariff ought to be "revised by its friends," and that it "ought to be revised whenever changed conditions" in connection with any schedule demanded revision. This Republican party that by this false pretense added to its majority, and perhaps procured its majority, is ready now to do nothing, is ready to say nothing except to veto whatever may come up in the way of change or revision.

The other day in the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. Chairman, a bill was offered and voted upon to reduce the tariff duties wherever they were over 100 per cent down to 100 per cent, and a strict party vote was cast upon the call of the yeas and nays in the committee, the call for the yeas and nays having been purposely made so that the ordinary committee rule of not mentioning what was done in committee should not apply. On a straight party vote the Republicans on the committee voted down the proposition to reduce duties over 100 per cent to 100 per cent.

Now, upon yesterday, Mr. Chairman—and this discussion is peculiarly appropriate here, because amongst other things contained in this urgent deficiency bill is an appropriation to carry on some sort of Pan-American work. Originally that work was inaugurated for the purpose of obtaining reciprocal trade relations between us and the other two Americas—Central and South. We have not obtained any; the Senate never passes any; the House passes no bills looking toward that view. Old James G. Blaine had looked forward to this sort of reciprocal trade relations as a great thing for the United States. He is dead and gone the way of all flesh. The Republican party now knows not Joseph and remembers not James G. Blaine, and seems to have forgotten McKinley almost, and has turned its back upon all sorts of trade arrangements with all the balance of the world, except, recently, when frightened and bulldozed by the Emperor of Germany, it granted some reciprocal arrangements in the way of custom-house regulations for the purpose of giving Germany an unfair advantage over Great Britain, which furnishes us with most of our market. It is peculiarly appropriate, I say, that we should discuss this question right now upon this urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. Chairman—I came very near saying Mr. Speaker, because I see the Speaker looking at me with a considerable degree of interest—I notice that in the gentleman's letter he says that the country "enjoyed prosperity unparalleled." Yes; that is true. Mexico has enjoyed prosperity; Canada has enjoyed prosperity; the Argentine Republic has enjoyed it, and nearly all the new countries of the world have, of late years, enjoyed "prosperity unparalleled," to use the language of the gentleman from New York; and once before upon this floor I have had the honor to demonstrate that the prosperity of Mexico, of the Argentine Republic, of New Zealand, and Canada was solely due to the passage of the Dingley bill.

The gentleman announces his opposition to "a general revision of the tariff." Why, bless his soul! Mr. Chairman, none of us were ever stupid enough to imagine that he was going to lend his countenance to "a general revision of the tariff." Some of us were stupid enough, and among others myself, to imagine that if we could show a particular schedule to be ridiculous that the gentleman would lend his countenance to a revision of that special schedule. I think the Massachusetts people have demonstrated the hide-and-leather and boot-and-shoe schedule to be absolutely ridiculous; and we had hoped there would be some reduction of that. In order to comply with any possible movement of moderately sane Republican sentiment upon that subject, I have introduced two bills before the committee—one reducing the duty on hides to 5 per cent and reducing the balance of the schedule about 50 per cent, and another bill to put hides on the free list and the balance of the schedule to be reduced about 70 per cent. We can not get a voice from the Committee on Ways and Means in favor of either bill. Take your choice. Either will satisfy us and Massachusetts.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One word, and I will let the gentleman interrupt me. Not only Massachusetts, but the entire history of the country to-day and for four years has demonstrated the absurdity of the steel schedule; and, as representing this side of the House, I have introduced a bill not drastic, not revolutionary, but simply to reduce the steel schedule 40 per cent upon some articles and 60 per cent upon some others, averaging about 50 per cent upon the entire schedule.

Upon yesterday, Mr. Chairman, I introduced a bill to put antitoxin and diphtheria serum upon the free list. They now bear a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem, and a family that wants antitoxin or diphtheria serum has got to pay from $6 to $25 in a case of sickness. So that the children of the poor are absolutely cut off from having their lives saved by this most remarkable medical discovery of the nineteenth century. Not many of the poor can pay these charges.

I had hoped that the Republicans upon the Committee on Ways and Means would at least listen to the voices of the children moaning in the land. But I have no idea now, after the letter from the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to his colleague, Mr. MCCALL, representing his party as he does on this that even the cries of the children—poor, inarticulate little ones—will receive any sort of heed.

Yesterday, Mr. Chairman, I cut out of a newspaper this poem. Who wrote it I know not, but it is well written. It is signed "R." and addressed to the editors. It reads as follows:

To the Editors—

Quoting first from Shakespeare's King John—

"Thou art damn'd as black—nay, nothing is so black;
Thou art more deep damn'd than Prince Lucifer:
There is not yet so ugly a fiend of hell
As thou shalt be, if thou didst kill this child."

And the great poet denounce the man who was suspected of having one child. Oh, that he were with us now to suitably anathematize those persons who, to put a little money in their pockets, have, under the tariff, increased the cost of antitoxin and diphtheria thereby putting it out of the reach of an unknown number of children who have died for want of these medicines.

The persons who are financially benefitted by the tariff on these drugs could without crowding be put in a very small room; yet the people of this country's eighty million of persons has to pay them whenever a dose of antitoxin is administered to a sick child.

And it can thus be said to each citizen of this great country—

Quoting the Bard of Avon once more—

And I especially direct this appeal to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. I know, notwithstanding the fact that he worships the schedules of protectionism as if he were a fetish worshiper, that at the bottom of him he has a kind and benevolent heart. I know that he is a good father, I know that he is a good husband, and this last appeal I direct to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I understood I was to have fifteen minutes in addition to the five minutes usually allowed. That was the request.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have ten minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ten minutes will amply finish it.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman's time will be extended ten minutes by unanimous consent of the House.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the fall of the hammer interfered with this pathetic appeal to the conscience and the benevolence of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. I am not appealing to his statesmanship, because he, being a worshiper of protectionism, has no statesmanship, and that would be an idle pursuit upon my part, but I am appealing to his heart as a man.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise informally to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5303. An act granting to the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, of Montana, a right of way through the Fort Keogh Military Reservation, in Montana, and for other purposes;

S. 5306. An act providing for the establishment of a life-saving station at or near Neah Bay, in the State of Washington, and for the construction of a first-class ocean-going tug to be used in connection therewith, for life-saving purposes in the vicinity of the north Pacific coast of the United States, and for other purposes;

S. 5325. An act to amend the act approved March 6, 1896, relating to the anchorage and movements of vessels in St. Marys River;

S. 5376. An act to grant certain lands to the State of Minnesota to be used as a site for the construction of a sanitarium for the treatment of consumptives;

S. 4525. An act for the relief of Sarah E. Baxter, executrix of the last will and testament of Warren S. Baxter;

S. 5237. An act confirming to certain claimants thereto portions of lands known as "Fort Clinch Reservation," in the State of Florida;

S. 1668. An act for the relief of the administrator of the estate of Gotlob Graeginger; and

S. 290. An act to amend the act approved March 15, 1878, entitled "An act for the relief of William A. Hammond, late surgeon general of the Army."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolutions of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 128. Joint resolution to prevent unnecessary printing and binding and to correct evils in the present method of distribution of public documents; and

H. J. Res. 127. Joint resolution to correct abuses in the public printing and to provide for the allotment of cost of certain documents and reports.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 8861. An act to amend chapter 1295, Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands after allotment," as amended by section 9 of chapter 1479, Revised Statutes of the United States.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, as usual the Senate, at a critical moment, has interfered with an appeal to humanity and to sound legislative instinct. [Laughter.] I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will listen to this, and I hope it will touch his heart, and I hope he will let this one bill, at least, pass his committee, that the cries of the children may be heard in the land.

> Duller shouldst thou be than the fat weed
> That rots itself in ease on Lethe wharf,
> Wouldst thou not stir in this.

Just this little bit of a bill; let it out of committee; for Heaven's sake do something! You Republicans said that the tariff ought to be "reformed by its friends." Why, if the tariff in all of its abuses ever had a friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is its friend; and if it ever had a right bower in the House, in the "house of friendship," the Speaker of this House is its right bower; and if it ever had—oh, what shall I call it, not a left bower——

A MEMBER. A joker.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The dignity of a left bower is too low; but if it ever had a joker in the house of its friends, why, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] is that joker. Surely the tariff is now in the hands of its friends; nearly a two-thirds majority over here and almost as large a majority in the other wing of the Capitol; somewhat of an uncertainty, it is true, at the other end of the Avenue, around about the White House; but you Republicans are so much accustomed to this uncertainty upon many other questions that it need not freeze you at all. I appeal to you, "friends of the tariff." I appeal to you at least to remove the duty on antitoxin and diphtheria serum, that the poor children can get it for less than from six to twenty-four dollars a case, depending upon the virulency of the case.

Are you going to stand pat on that too? Are you going to stand pat, with the empty pretense in your mouths that you want to "protect labor" against the bill you have already turned down in your committee, to reduce duties, wherever they were over 100 per cent, to 100 per cent? For a little time you tried to meet that by saying there were no duties over a hundred per cent. I quoted you the other day—fifty-seven of them from Austin's report—your Austin, your partisan statistician—which shows that notwithstanding the fact that many other duties over 100 per cent were prohibitive and prevented imports, those fifty-seven had to come over even that tariff; because Austin's report was the report of actual importations. In addition to that there are fifty-odd more that are prohibitive, and that can not appear in a report of that sort, because no actual importations are made, the tariff acting as a Chinese wall preventing entry. In the latter case we have ideal Republican protectionism, a system shutting us off absolutely from the things we need and want and need as cheap as we can get them.

Are you going to stand pat on the steel schedules which the steel trust exploited at the expense of our consumers, with the magnificent flamboyant announcement of remarkable dividends at its last annual settlement? Are you going to stand pat upon the powder trust, with the immense charge they are making to the Government every year over and above cost and a reasonable profit, as has been demonstrated upon this floor by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRANT], one of your own Members? Are you going to stand pat upon the armor-plate trust instead of letting the United States Government make its own armor plate? Are you going to stand pat against Massachusetts—that federalistic Republican Massachusetts that has tied her destinies to you for so many years, that has supported you in season and out of season, who comes here now appealing for cheaper raw material in order that the American manufacturers may continue the work of taking possession of the markets of the world? Are you going to turn a deaf ear to both the Democratic and the Republican parties in that State?

Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN].

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact, which possibly he does not know, that the partisan newspapers in the State of Massachusetts are industriously misquoting the position of the gentleman from Mississippi. You have just stated that you have introduced a bill to repeal the duty on hides and sole leather. I want to ask the gentleman whether, if the Republicans on the Committee on Ways and Means will report that bill to the House, you will give your support to it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Absolutely and undoubtedly, not only my vote but every vote on this side of the Chamber, if that bill is brought in, will be for the bill. We have never asked anything of Massachusetts manufacturers except that when they demand equity in the halls of the National Legislature they shall do equity. That bill provides that they shall do equity while demanding equity. The great State of Texas would be glad to give up the duty on hides if in consequence of it she can get the reduction provided in that bill upon harness, saddles, and boots and shoes. There is not a county in the great State of Texas whose people would not make more money in a week by the reduction of the price of boots and shoes and harness and saddles that would follow the passage of that bill than they could gain in ten years by the maintenance of the duty on hides. There will not be a vote cast against that bill upon this side, upon either bill which I have introduced on this side of the Chamber. We yearn to get the Massachusetts Republicans sufficiently in earnest to prod the elephant and to make the elephant move.

Mr. PRINCE rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PRINCE. It is only fair to the House that the gentleman should change the name of Mr. PRINCE of Illinois to Mr. CRAFTS of Illinois; he was the one who demonstrated the profits of the powder trust.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will make that change.

Mr. PRINCE. I want to say further that the Committee on Military Affairs has reported a bill appropriating $350,000 for the purpose of building and purchasing a powder plant. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I am absolutely delighted that there is some committee of this House wielding power in the name of the Republican party that can listen partially, at any rate, to the voice of the people.

I introduced a bill appropriating $750,000 for the establishment of a powder plant. I would rather see that bill go through than one appropriating $300,000, and I will explain why. This constituent of yours in Illinois, Mr. Waddell, who has addressed everyone of us here, is of like opinion. If you appropriate too small a sum, you are going to do your powder manufacturing upon too small a scale. If you appropriate a sufficient amount to make all the powder that is needed for the Army and the Navy and be done with it, you will have your manufactory upon a wholesale scale, with all the economies involved in wholesale production. If you start a plant with only $300,000, I am afraid you will find that the smallness of your operation will add to the expense of the operation so much that the powder will cost you more money than it ought to cost. I am afraid that the enemies of the people want you to give an object lesson of that sort. But it will still cost less than 70 cents a pound, which is what we are now paying the powder trust, and somewhere down to 50 or 60 cents a pound, even with your insufficient $300,000 plant. With a plant of sufficient capacity it ought to cost somewhere between 30 and 40 cents a pound.

But I am glad even for special favors from this stand-pat party, from this Grand Old Procrastinator—this G. O. P.—always waiting for "changed conditions" and never having sense enough to recognize changed conditions even when they come.

My heavens! Has not the changed condition come in connection with the steel schedule? We are shipping locomotives to Siberia, we are sending railroad iron to Canada and to Mexico and to South Africa, and yet these gentlemen tell us that conditions have not changed since the time when the Dingley bill was adopted—a time at which the American steel manufacturers could no more have competed with British railroad iron makers and locomotive makers than they could have flown. What do you want as a demonstration of a change of condition more emphatic, I ask you, than that? We are sending our structural iron for bridges and for house building to nearly all parts of the world. We are sending our barbed wire past the doors of Great Britain to her own colony, South Africa. We are sending steel nails to South Africa and even to New Zealand. Yet gentlemen say that the "changed conditions" have not come. As for the steel schedule, why do you want to keep that duty? Do the steel manufacturers need it to meet foreign competitors? No; they don't. The only thing that they need it for in the world is to exploit the American consumer in a sheltered market by selling to him at a higher price than they do to those very people in South Africa, Siberia, and the Argentine Republic, to whom they export the goods. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect my letter would please the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. In fact, I am proud of the fact that it displeases the gentleman from Mississippi. He speaks of that calm judicial frame of mind in formulating a tariff bill. Then he speaks with pride of one of his own offspring, which was evidently formulated not in that calm and judicial frame of mind of which he speaks. He says the Committee on Ways and Means, by a strict party vote, voted down his proposition to reduce all tariffs to 100 per cent where ever they exceeded that amount. Of course we did, and of course, we had the most excellent reason for it. We are not amending tariff schedules on the line of the lack of information of the gentleman from Mississippi. We are collecting here an internal-revenue tax on alcohol over 800 per cent upon its value—an internal-revenue tax.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. I can not yield at this time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But surely the gentleman does not want to misconstrue anything. I merely want to correct the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. PAYNE. We put a customs tax upon the same article sufficient to take care of our internal-revenue tax, a tax I believe of $2.25 a gallon upon the importation. Under the reciprocity treaty with Germany we admit their alcohol at $1.75. Under our Cuban reciprocity treaty we admit their alcohol at 20 per cent reduction of the customs tax. Under this we are importing alcohol from Germany and alcohol from Cuba, and to reduce that customs tax to 100 per cent would simply drive out every gallon of the 130,000,000 gallons of alcohol that we are producing in this country from domestic distilleries and fill the vacuum with alcohol from a foreign country. Of course we could not stand for that.

Then we have a tax upon tobacco aimed at the Sumatra wrapper, at $1.85 a pound. This is equivalent to an ad valorem duty of about 250 per cent. It is a high rate; put on there why? Because a pound of Sumatra tobacco will wrap as many cigars as 4 or 5 pounds of the domestic article. It needs a high duty in order to protect the farmers of Connecticut and other parts of the country who raise leaf suitable for wrappers, and to reduce that duty to 100 per cent would simply drive out from this country the industry of raising tobacco leaf for wrappers. Not only that, but it would reduce the tax on cigars, put purposely high in order to compensate for the duty placed upon the wrappers, and enable our cigar manufacturers of this country to compete with cigar manufacturers in Cuba and other countries; to encourage the labor of those thousands of men engaged in the manufacture of cigars in this country. We could not enter into the calm judicial frame of mind of the gentleman from Mississippi, or into his lack of information on the subject, that would strike down these two industries by reducing all duties to 100 per cent ad valorum.

There was a time, Mr. Chairman, a few years ago when a distinguished gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in a Democratic House, came into the House with a proposition to reduce all tariff rates 20 per cent, or, in other words, to collect 80 per cent of the then present tariff upon all articles coming into this country. That bill was examined in the light of the interests of the industries and the laborers of this country, but it was found that it would open the gates and destroy many an industry and take the bread from the mouth of many a laborer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman may be extended, that he may be able to finish his remarks.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for fifteen minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that his time may be extended for fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked that it may be extended in order that he may be able to complete his remarks, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I think that I can conclude my remarks in fifteen minutes. Now, that bill and the author of it became known to fame and to ridicule from one end of the country to the other as Horizontal Bill—Horizontal Bill Mercer son, with his horizontal bill. It was ridiculed by the press, the ended by the people, and ridiculed out of this House. Yet the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], taking wisdom from the gentleman from Illinois and copying his bill, comes in with a horizontal reduction bill of 20 per cent to those favored nations who are willing to reduce their tariff in order that we may get into their markets—reducing ours by a horizontal reduction of 20 per cent, a reduction that in some industries would bring widespread ruin into the country. Then a few years ago another distinguished citizen, also from Illinois, was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and he brought in several special bills relating to special articles and special schedules and brought them into the House one after the other, revising the tariff by piecemeal. That gentleman's bills were called "popgun bills," originated by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] evidently has become a diligent student of the gentleman from Illinois, the former chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, because he amuses himself by introducing before the Committee on Ways and Means these special bills like the popgun bills of years ago, which were ridiculed from one end of this country to the other.

And he advocates to-day upon this floor slight amendments here and there, or great amendments here and there, to particular schedules in the tariff bill. The majority of the committee do not believe in either kind of change in the tariff. They know whatever bill is brought in here will not meet the assent of a majority of the House upon various matters unless we have a general revision that takes into its consideration the whole tariff question and which, while it may not change materially many schedules in the present law, will yet change some, and by a process of comparison of views will result in perfecting a tariff bill which could pass the House. The subject of hides has been spoken of. I understood the gentleman to say and pledge his side that if a free-hide bill came into the House they would all vote for it.

I remember in 1897 an amendment was offered by a gentleman who was at that time an assistant Democrat from the State of Kansas, the late Jerry Simpson, of Kansas, putting a duty on hides. I say "assistant Democrat." He was one of the avant couriers of the Democratic party. He stood in 1897 where the whole party stood in the year 1900, and he fought in that amendment and I was curious to see the vote of that side of the House in favor of a duty on hides as an amendment to the Dingley bill. Every gentleman coming from a cattle-raising State on that side of the House rose and voted for the amendment. I do not know what they will do now just before election——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PAYNE. But I believe if it were eighteen months before election, as it was when we passed the Dingley bill, they would be in that calm and judicial frame of mind that they would still vote, coming from a cattle section, for a duty upon hides.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman now permit an interruption?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not like to be interrupted; I did not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, the gentleman speaks of antitoxin; says it sometimes cost $6 a case and sometimes $24 a case. Afterwards he said something which might indicate that it depended upon the size of the case, and that the tariff is 25 per cent, and it was beyond the reach of poor people. Well, antitoxin is a comparatively recent discovery. It is a most valuable medicine, as I had occasion to know only three or four years since——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PAYNE. It was then within my reach, and cost only about the price of ordinary medicine—why will the gentleman interrupt——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because the gentleman does not want to misquote me. When I said "case" I meant "patient;" not a case of goods, but a case of sickness. Six dollars for a dose. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman interrupted me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In order that the gentleman may understand what I meant was this: That it was $6 a dose; that it was $6 for each patient, and sometimes they required four doses for a case or for a patient.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman explained himself, because, as I say, three years ago this medicine was prescribed for my own personal use, and I paid the bill at the drug store after I got well. I had two doses of it, two different doses, and each dose cost less than a dollar instead of $6 a dose. It is a fact that many States in the Union provide free antitoxin for the use of any person who desires it, manufacturing it for that purpose, so the gentleman's tale of woe is founded simply upon a fiction of some newspaper writer who has been writing over his initials, as I understand, for some newspaper and not upon the facts in the case, and yet the gentleman goes off upon this and wants to revise the tariff and take away the small duty of 25 per cent upon the antitoxin that comes into this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, but I am not through yet.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I thought he had finished.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman wandered over a good deal of ground and I want to follow it as far as I am able from the very few notes I have upon the subject.

The gentleman speaks of smokeless powder and the provision made by the Committee on Military Affairs to build a manufactory in this country. He says that is all on account of the high duty on powder. Well, it is true, Mr. Chairman, that in making smokeless powder alcohol is one of the chief ingredients, and that the duty has to be a considerable duty as long as we pay such a high internal-revenue rate upon the alcohol which is used in making it. There is no question about that. The price for it does not depend upon the duty upon the article. The article is protected by a patent or patents, and every ounce of smokeless powder manufactured in the United States is made under these letters patent; and that is the reason that these people get a higher price than they are entitled to for the article while we furnish them the alcohol free from internal-revenue tax. They make the powder under bids; the bids of a combination of these people who are licensed under these patents; and there is no escape for it, except for the Army to do what the Navy has been doing—make their own powder, taking possession of the patents which have been granted upon that article. I understand that these patents were secured by some gentleman who was then in the employ of the Government of the United States, and their invention was discovered while in this employ of the Government of the United States, and that some concession has been made to the Navy Department which was not made to the War Department, with reference to this article.

Now, the gentleman speaks of the prosperity of Canada and the prosperity of Argentina, and he might have spoken of the prosperity in Germany and the prosperity in France; and he might have commented upon the lack of unparalleled prosperity in Great Britain. The Canadians are prosperous, and, unlike the gentleman from Mississippi, being upon the ground and studying the conditions, the statesmen in Canada attribute their growth in manufacture, their growth in prosperity, to their protective tariff. Why, it is not many years ago that Bismarck commented on the wonderful prosperity of the United States, and it was the judgment of that greatest statesman of his day that that prosperity was due to the protective system maintained in the United States; and he advocated the same protective system in Germany; and the German Government was wise enough to adopt it, and the German people and their laborers are prosperous to-day under similar conditions with those that obtain in the United States, under the protecting wing of a tariff which gives them an opportunity to supply their home market.

The gentleman says we were not sending steel rails and locomotives to the four quarters of the world before the Dingley bill. No; we were not selling a great many in this country, either, previous to the Dingley bill and for a few years before, when our industries were somewhat idle in this country; but under the Dingley bill we can not supply the demand that comes to our factories from the railroads in this country, busy with carrying freight of the people, the prosperous people of this country, and at the same time meet all the demands that come to us from the four quarters of the globe for American locomotives, American cars, and American rails. But the gentleman will say we are selling the same articles cheaper abroad than we are at home. True. Every country in the world sells articles cheaper abroad than they do at home. There is no country that has not an export price and a home price.

One of the contentions recently settled for a time with Germany was this: They asked us to appraise their exports to us at the export price; to allow them in the custom-house at New York to enter their goods at the exporting price and not at the manufacturer's price of the country of their origin. Of course we refused this, because it would result in a horizontal reduction of our tariff. Great Britain, a free-trade country—not free trade because she does not collect any duties on her imports, but free trade because she does not collect duties upon those articles which she produces in her own territory; free trade according to the idea of the gentleman from Mississippi—a duty put upon articles for revenue and not for protection. England sells goods cheaper abroad than she sells them at home, and sells them continually. So it is with this modern evolution of trade that compels, that impels the big department store in the city to allow people coming from the surrounding towns the amount of their railroad fares, the amount of their expenses, selling their goods at the same price to them, and even at a lower price than they do to people living in their own town, because it extends their trade beyond the natural limits, and they get a clear though smaller profit, while they sell their goods a little cheaper abroad than they sell them at home.

And so, Mr. Chairman, I, for one, looking about me on every hand, into the gentleman's State of Mississippi, into every quarter of this Union, and seing a demand for labor, a demand that can not be satisfied, because there are not a sufficient number of laborers to do the work; seeing the prosperity that is in front of every man's door and in every man's place of business, would not do anything to interrupt this flood of prosperity. Correct a duty here and there, enter into a general discussion of the tariff, and you will surely produce unrest, stop business, frighten capital, rob labor, and run the risk of the conditions attending the tariff of 1894. Mr. Chairman, so long as we have this prosperity, while the conditions are as they are to-day, so long as the good in sight will overbalance the evils sure to come, the Republican party will have the courage to stand by its convictions, fortified as they are by the experience of all the world, fortified by the statements of the great statesmen of the foremost nations of all the world. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is now under discussion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will resort to the parliamentary device of moving to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I am informed that this antitoxin and diphtheria serum costs from $4 to $6 per dose, and that it requires from one to six doses for each patient. I have consulted a Republican Member of the House who is a physician, and whose name I will not mention, and he tells me that the average cost per patient is $5, that the dose is from one to two thousand "units," that 1,000 units cost $2.50, that 5,000 units cost $5, and that ordinary cases require from two to three thousand units. This agrees with the other information that I have given of the cost, as running from $4 to $6, $5 being an average statement.

Now, I can not account for the fact that the gentleman from New York got his for $1, unless it was because, being chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and charged very largely with responsibility for the tariff upon the subject-matter, manufacturers gave him a "rebate" in order that he might safely "stand pat" upon their particular steal. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the other day I did not mention alcohol or tobacco among the fifty-sven articles bearing a tax of over 100 per cent.

Mr. PAYNE. I am speaking of the gentleman's bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, very well; but the gentleman would not allow me to interrupt him, even to correct a misstatement.

Mr. PAYNE. I am speaking of the gentleman's bill which was before the committee——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not wish to be interrupted, Mr. Chairman, unless the gentleman will let me have just that much more time. The other day I used this language:

> Outside of tobacco and spirituous liquors, I find fifty-seven cases of duties on goods actually imported of over 100 per cent. I have not thought it fair to use them—> because they have been levied partially for the purpose of countervailing an internal-revenue tax, and of course there ought to be a tariff equal to and somewhat above the internal-revenue tax.

That is, the duties on alcohol and tobacco—

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] can not pretend to have misunderstood my purpose; and if the bill introduced by me and referred to a moment ago needed amendment, to strike out "tobacco and spirituous liquors," then I hazard the remark that nobody in this House is ignorant of the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, when that committee is in session, has a right to move an amendment to a bill before the committee, and nobody doubts that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] had a right to move that amendment. In order that there may be no doubt about that at all, I shall reintroduce the bill and amend it, leaving out tobacco and alcoholic liquors, so that the gentleman may not be put to the physical discomfort of moving to amend in the committee; and I now announce that I will accept the amendment if he offers it to the bill as now hastily written. The gentleman can not hide behind any hedge of that sort, and he can not throw dust in the eyes of the public. He can not blind them to the fact that a whole lot of these duties over 100 per cent are upon woolen goods of the commonest sort of necessity to the people, and he can not blind them to the fact that some of these duties are also upon glass, and, amongst other articles of glass, ordinary window-pane glass that the ordinary mechanic puts into his house, and that the ordinary negro laborer needs in his cabin.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not yield right now. If I can I will yield later.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Correct that statement about hides.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, before my time expires I wish to say I had understood that it was denied upon that side that there was any tariff on antitoxin serum, and the Hon. ALBERT S. BURLESON, of Texas, wrote a letter to the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and got a reply, which I shall now read to the House:

> TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
> Washington, March 23, 1900.
> Hon. A. S. BURLESON,
> House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.
> SIR: In reply to your communication, dated March 21, 1900, requesting information as to whether the tariff prohibits the importation, free of duty, of antitoxins, I am informed by the division of customs, Treasury Department, that antitoxin is subject to 25 per cent ad valorem duty in general with other medicinal preparations not containing alcohol.
> Respectfully, WALTER WYMAN, > Surgeon-General.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the last paragraph.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent for time enough to answer the question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] incorrectly stated a few minutes ago that the Democrats over here voted to tax hides when you framed the Dingley tariff. Do you remember history that way? I know you do not, and never will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman misunderstood the gentleman from New York. What the gentleman said was that when there was a motion made here to put hides upon the free list certain gentlemen upon this side voted against the motion; and that is true.

Mr. PAYNE rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I say that statement is true. You are not going to quarrel with me about my saying it is true, are you?

Mr. PAYNE. The motion was made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] to put a duty on hides. That is what we voted on, and that is what so many Democrats voted for.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, Mr. Chairman, there was later a motion made to put hides upon the free list.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And if you do not put hides upon the free list now, we will take the hides off from you. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. There was a motion made to put hides upon the free list, but there was no reduction at all proposed in that motion upon boots and shoes and harness to the people of the United States. And while I myself voted for that motion I had my doubts about it, and I will say now that if that motion by itself and alone, and unsupported by any reduction of other duties upon the leather schedule, were placed before this House to-day, I would vote against it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We will give equity whenever the other fellows are ready to do equity. I have introduced two bills giving them a chance to do equity and announcing here that we are willing to do it.

I ask Massachusetts Republicans to join me in support of either bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from New York to grant me five minutes for general debate.

Mr. LITTAUER. I can not grant that now, because we must be getting along with this bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It will not take much time.

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this paragraph end in five minutes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I arose a few days ago to address the Speaker in behalf of my colleague [Mr. RHODES] and his bill for the relief of the Missouri soldiers of the civil war. I was indulging in some preliminary remarks in criticism of the arbitrary methods of the Speaker, when, upon objection by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], I was ruled off of the floor. I had just read from the morning papers that the Speaker had "given it out flat-footed that he would not permit the House to concur in the Senate amendments to the statehood bill," and was deprecating that one-man power had taken away from the people their free government, when my remarks were brought to a sudden stop by a sharp rap of the gavel. I now propose to pick up the thread of my speech where I dropped it then.

My colleague [Mr. RHODES] has introduced a bill giving a pensionable status to the Missouri soldiers who rallied around the flag in the war of the rebellion. One or another of us has introduced this bill into every Congress for twenty-five years. It has never been allowed to come to a vote. It has always been smothered in committee. These old soldiers deserve well at our hands. In the prime of their lives and the pride of their manhood they answered their country's call. They risked their lives to save the Union. Upon their bodies they bear the scars of battle. They are racked with disease contracted in the service of the Republic. They are old now and poor. Suffering, they stand upon the brink of the grave and raise their voices to Congress for relief. Hear their voice, Mr. Speaker. No-body obstructs them but you. If you will let them have a vote, this House will pass their bill. All they ask of you is that you permit the House to vote. We are here—DE ARMOND, CLARK, LLOYD, RUCKER, HUNT, WOOD, SHACKLEFORD—all ready and anxious to vote for the measure. Take your heavy hand off the old soldier, Mr. Speaker, and let my colleague [Mr. RHODES] call up his bill. Missouri—magnificent, majestic Missouri—implores you to let us give tardy justice to her old heroes of the war.

Sir, my colleague [Mr. RHODES] is entitled to your most kindly consideration. His people, as one man, are in favor of statehood for Oklahoma. He favors it himself, yet with singular loyalty and devotion to your authority he disregarded his constituency's wishes to comply with yours—sacrificed his own convictions to your caprice, and voted to lash the people of Oklahoma to a corpse. Then, sir, I beg you not to forget your faithful retainer; let him call up his bill.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to you to give back to the people their representative government.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, just a second, and a second only. I have listened to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]. If it affords him any consolation to make me a stalking horse on account of his quarrel with the minority leader, well and good. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I deny that my quarrel with you, Mr. Speaker, has any such foundation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, after line 5, insert: "That said delegates of the United States are hereby instructed to advocate the establishment of reciprocal tariff relations between the United States and other American States."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I will make a point of order against that, or I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I call for order.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will state his point of order.

Mr. DALZELL. It is not germane to the bill.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York had reserved the point of order, and I had begun to discuss it. I make the point of order that the gentleman's point of order is out of order.

Mr. DALZELL. I had a right to make it.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The gentleman has no right to make it during the course of my remarks.

Mr. DALZELL. I have a right to make the point of order at any time.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I had addressed the Chair, and was about to continue my remarks when some kind-hearted gentleman asked for order in the House. At that moment the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] made his point of order. It seems to me that as I had begun my remarks the point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] having been first reserved, that I can not, under the rules of this House, be cut off any more than if I had continued for several minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] made his point of order as speedily as he could after the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] had reserved the point of order and taken his seat.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Does the Chair rule that if he made it as speedily as possible, although he made it after I had begun my remarks, that his point of order can be considered?

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] had first to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not rule upon that phase of the question. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] was in time to make his point of order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Let me ask if the Chair knows the facts, and then we will understand the ruling of the Chair. Does the Chair understand that I had not actually begun my remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Massachusetts rose, and a point of order was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], who afterwards reserved his point of order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. And that before the gentleman from Massachusetts was again recognized the Chair recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] to make a point of order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Then I wish to state to the Chair, because I assume the Chair desires to be fair, occupying the chair only for a brief time—and I trust he will occupy it much longer later—that the Chair is mistaken in his facts, and being mistaken in his facts and being corrected on those facts, I now ask the Chair if he will not make a correct ruling upon the facts as ascertained for him now?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I should like first to have the answer of the Chair.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Has the amendment been reported by the Clerk?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been reported by the Clerk.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman, having stated the actual facts and not the facts as the Chair erroneously conceived them to be, I will humbly request the Chair to make a ruling which is in accordance with the facts in the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already ruled and believes that his idea of the facts is the correct statement of the facts, and will not change his ruling.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I move to strike out the last word, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, but I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts on the point of order if he desires to be heard, although the Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. As the Chair has announced his readiness to rule on the point of order, and as the Chair has shown clearly that he does not desire to be corrected, I shall not attempt to make any argument.

Mr. DALZELL. The Chair does not need correction. The Chair stated the facts as they existed.

Mr. BARTLETT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order then.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order that the House is in disorder and ought to be in order before the Chair settles the question of order. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, this is an appropriation of $60,000 to meet the expenses of delegates of the United States to the International Conference of American States, and this amendment which I have offered is a direction to these delegates to consider, to discuss, to advocate the establishment of reciprocal tariff relations between the United States and other States in America. I regret that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] have felt a party necessity to make a point of order against the amendment which simply seeks to impose a duty upon delegates to discuss the question of reciprocity as one of the questions which are to be discussed by the delegates at that conference. I do not desire to argue the question further.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman, the debate which we have had here has clearly shown that there is no chance of getting any tariff revision in this House, and the amendment which I just offered was for the purpose of permitting a peaceable discussion of reciprocal tariff relations at this conference, having in mind that by the House's stubborn refusal to even consider the question of tariff revision the only way to get it is by treaties with other nations. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] took pains to ridicule the bills offered by the gentlemen from Massachusetts asking for a repeal of the duty upon hides and characterized them as pop-gun bills. Undoubtedly the constituents of the gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. MCNARY, Mr. ROBERTS, and Mr. LOVERING], all of whom have introduced bills for the repeal of the duty on hides, will be pleased with the sneers of the gentleman from New York at the bills which they have introduced. There is a willingness in this House to discuss the tariff upon this floor at any time. None of the leaders of the majority is disinclined to discuss it when any minority Member brings the subject forward. They are all ready to discuss it on the floor, because there is no tariff bill pending and because it is purely an academic discussion, but they are not ready to discuss a reduction of the tariff in the only place where it can be a practical discussion, namely, within the doors of the Committee on Ways and Means. The chairman of that committee is ready to defend the tariff policy of his party upon the floor of this House when there is no bill pending, but he stubbornly refuses to open the doors of that committee and grant relief to the thousands of manufacturers throughout this land who believe that the Dingley schedules are outgrown, and who are asking only for a moderate share of relief.

Now, then, if that tariff is as sound as he claims it to be, why does he fear to open the doors of the room of the Committee on Ways and Means to hear the manufacturers of this country? Surely the manufacturers understand their business better than the gentleman from New York is capable of understanding it for them, and if they say that the time has come to modify tariff schedules, if only a little and only in a reasonable way, why does the gentleman from New York persist in refusing to hear their moderate demands? The Secretary of the Treasury the other day said that the governor of Iowa was an enemy to his country because he was keeping up this tariff agitation, and he told us also the proper time to consider a tariff bill. He said the time was immediately after a Presidential election—that is, in the next session of Congress after a Presidential election—but we did not hear the Secretary tell us or tell the country in the first session of this Congress immediately succeeding the last Presidential election that that was an opportune time to discuss a tariff bill. No; in his opinion the time to discuss it is after a Presidential election that has not yet taken place, and when the Presidential election does take place and the session does arrive in which it is proper to discuss it, he will then ask to postpone it again until after the next Presidential election. And so these gentlemen continue to trifle with the legitimate demands of the people of this country. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the gentleman from New York has raised this point of order, because the people of the country believe that we ought to have relief. They believe there is some relation of cause and effect between the great contributions made by the corporations of this country to the Republican campaign. We heard it stated from high quarters last fall that the charge that tribute was levied upon corporations was an infamous lie, and to-day we find the facts admitted, and I am informed, though I will not state it upon my own responsibility, but only upon information, that just now the telegraph wires have brought us the news that the former vice-president of the New York Life Insurance Company has had a warrant issued for his arrest for giving the money of the policy holders without legal right to the treasurer of the last Republican campaign committee for party uses. Now, this money was paid into the hands of the Republican campaign managers, and it helped to carry the election in 1904 of a President and Members of Congress. Why was it given? I will not undertake to answer, but the refusal of this House to even discuss the modification of tariff schedules indicates clearly to thinking men that there is a relation of cause and effect between the giving of contributions and the failure to even consider the tariff question by the Committee on Ways and Means of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended unless the programme for the conference contains provision for a discussion of reciprocal trade relations between the countries participating in the conference.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Chair might as well pass upon the point of order. This is clearly a limitation upon this appropriation. It provides that no part of this money shall be expended except under certain contingencies. It is not legislation within the rulings made in the committee upon similar provisions.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, the amendment is not germane.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why, it is clearly germane. The fact is, they are now preparing a programme for this conference.

Mr. LITTAUER. This provision simply carries an appropriation for the purpose of holding the conference.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word upon the point of order. The question of limitation upon appropriations was up in the last Congress on two or three occasions, and where the amendment is clearly a limitation upon the appropriation, and could not be construed by the administrative officers into a legislative direction, it was held clearly in order; but where the limitation contains such language as it would be construed into a legislative direction, then it is legislation; it is more than a limitation, and it is obnoxious to the rule.

Now, this amendment provides that no part of the appropriation shall be expended unless the conference shall make a certain kind of programme, including in that the subject of reciprocal trade relations; and it amounts to a legislative direction as to what the programme shall be. It is more than a limitation. It goes clearly beyond it; and if the question should ever go to any court, any judicial tribunal for construction, the court would unhesitatingly say that it was the intention of Congress to direct the international congress to include in its programme the subject of reciprocal trade relations with the South American republics. That is, I say, beyond a limitation. It is legislative direction, and must be so construed by the Administration or by any judicial tribunal whose duty it may be to deal with it. In the last Congress, I think, the subject, not the particular question, but the principle, was involved in a number of rulings upon the post-office bill. I do not now have them in mind, but it was settled there, and it was announced as a clear and well-understood and all-pervading principle in the interpretation of laws that where the administrative officer gathers from the proposed amendment that it was the intention of Congress to include a legislative direction rather than a mere limitation upon the expenditure it is obnoxious to the rule.

Now, in this case, in determining this appropriation, the question might properly be asked, What is the appropriation for? It is to promote a general international conference. What is the conference to do? It is to discuss such things as it may deem proper, but among others the amendment requires it to discuss the subject of reciprocal trade relations. There is nothing clearer in my mind than that this amendment is legislative in its character, and obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana overlooked a very important fact, and that is that this entire paragraph is legislation. This conference, and the appointment of delegates to this conference, is not authorized by law. If the point of order had been interposed against this provision it would have been eliminated from the bill. Now, it is a well-established rule that where a legislative provision is put in a bill that is "new legislation," as known to the rules, any amendment that is germane to the provision is in order, although if the provision to which the amendment is offered were in order upon the bill, a "legislative" amendment would not be in order. I challenge any gentleman on the floor to show that there is any authority existing now for the appointment of the delegates to this conference; and that being the fact——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me suggest, if there be no authority for the appropriation of the money or the appointment of those delegates, the paragraph would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No point of order is made; and therefore, for parliamentary purposes, the status of the paragraph is the same as if there were a direct expressed authority for the appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why, most certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a well-established rule in this House that if a legislative provision in violation of the rule is incorporated upon an appropriation bill any provision is then in order as an amendment if it be germane to the provision to which the point of order was not raised.

What is the first point, Mr. Chairman, that the appointment of these delegates not being authorized by existing law the provision itself is new legislation; so that the point of order, so far as that is concerned, does not lie. More than that. Even if the appointment of delegates were authorized by law, Congress has the right to say that it will not appropriate a dollar to pay the expenses of the delegates unless they are going to discuss certain matters in the conference—that is, that the money will be appropriated upon certain conditions. If those conditions do not happen, the delegates can not go, and the money can not be spent. If that is not a limitation upon the expenditure of money under the rules of this House, I am unable to conceive any legislative provision that would be a limitation. These are the only two points that I wish to discuss.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I just wish to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like, in this connection, to read to the House a ruling had on the 31st of March, 1904, on some amendment:

"On March 31, 1904, the sundry civil appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when the Clerk read a paragraph, which, after modification, by unanimous consent, was presented in this form:

"SEC. 3. That all carriages and other vehicles used in the public service, other than for personal purposes, as authorized in section 2 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1905, the expenses for purchase, or maintaining, driving, or operating of which are paid from money appropriated by this act, shall have conspicuously painted thereon at all times the full name of the Executive Department or other branch of the public service to which the same belong and in the service of which the same are used."

Mr. JAMES R. MANN, of Illinois, made the point of order that the paragraph proposed legislation.

The Chairman sustained the point of order.

Thereupon Mr. HEMENWAY, of Indiana, proposed as a new paragraph the following:

"No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used for purchase, maintaining, driving, or operating any carriage or other vehicle other than those authorized for personal purposes in section 2 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1905, unless the same shall have conspicuously painted thereon at all times the full name of the Executive Department or other branch of the public service to which the same belongs and in the service of which the same are used."

Mr. MANN having made the same point of order, the Chairman held (Mr. THEODORE E. BURTON, of Ohio, being the Chairman):

"The Chair thinks this does not change existing law; that it is merely a limitation. It would seem that this legislative body was very much lacking in power if there could not be a provision in the way of a limitation that carriages used for public purposes shall have a designation upon them to that effect. The Chair is not ready to think that any parliamentary rule makes this other than a limitation. The Chair overrules the point of order."

That was the ruling of Mr. BURTON of Ohio.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that it was disclosed in the investigation made by the Committee on Appropriations that at the present time the programme of this conference has not been arranged. There are many questions which the representatives of the United States and of South American countries might discuss with profit to all the countries participating in the conference, but I take it that there is no matter of more supreme importance to the United States and to the South American countries than that question which affects the trade between the United States and South American countries. It has been reported that it is the intention to attempt to mollify the South American countries; that an arrangement will be made by which the Monroe doctrine will be strengthened, and that these South American countries will be protected against European nations in the collection of debts from them by force. While these are matters of great importance to the South American countries, the question in which the people of the United States are particularly interested is the question of how best to advance our trade with the South American countries. If there are possibilities for great export trade between the United States and the countries of South America, this would be a very opportune and advisable time to discuss them. The Secretary of State himself, while not proposing to attend the conference as a delegate, expects personally to visit the place where the conference is to be held and as many of the South American capitals as it will be possible for him to visit. It will be of the greatest importance to us if the chief questions to be discussed in this conference shall be questions affecting trade, because as the head of the Department of State the Secretary in his visit there can impress his views upon the representatives of the other governments. If I am correctly informed, no one will have more to say about the programme for this conference than the Secretary of State of the United States, and if it is made to appear to him that no money will be available for the delegates to this conference unless the programme contains a provision for the discussion of reciprocal trade relations between the countries participating in the conference, there will be no doubt whatever that he will arrange that that question will have a prominent part in the programme of this conference. For that reason, believing that Congress should retain control over the moneys appropriated for public purposes and that Congress should determine the particular uses to which these moneys shall be put, I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, there is a provision in the tariff of 1897 looking toward the establishment of reciprocal trade relations between the United States and other countries. In pursuance of that provision a commissioner of the United States was instructed by the President to negotiate tariff treaties, and he negotiated, I believe, some sixteen tariff treaties between the United States and South American countries. All of those were reported to the United States Senate, and not one of them has ever been ratified. There was a great desire then to establish better trade relations——

Mr. WATSON. I desire to make the point of order on this discussion. My recollection is—if I am in error the Chair can so inform me——

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. No; the gentleman is making a point of order.

Mr. WATSON. My recollection is that debate on this paragraph was closed. Therefore discussion is not in order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. But in the gentleman's absence an amendment was offered surreptitiously.

Mr. WATSON. No.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Debate on this paragraph and all amendments was closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion was made.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WATSON. The motion was made to close debate on the paragraph, but not upon the amendments. Thereafter an amendment was offered. I do not think that changes the result of the vote closing discussion upon the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Well, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to conclude my remarks, which will not take more than three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. There was a general desire for better trade relations with the South American countries. There is a greater need now for better trade relations with the South American countries and the United States.

Now, in the interval that has passed the trade between the South American countries and the United States has increased but very little. Our foreign trade would be greatly diminished to-day if it were not for the increases we have had in trade with the oriental countries. Other nations in Europe are getting a far larger percentage of South American trade than we are, and the reason for it is that our tariffs are hostile to the interests of the South American countries. If we can establish reasonable tariff relations between the United States and the South American countries, undoubtedly our commerce with those countries will be improved, and it is for the simple purpose of discussing the establishment of reciprocal tariff relations between the several states on this continent that this amendment is offered. I can not conceive how any gentleman on the other side can object to the mere discussion at the Pan-American conference of the necessity of establishing better trade relations between the United States and the several states of the American continent. I trust that no objection will be made to an amendment of that character.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TAWNEY. I thought the gentleman from Massachusetts had concluded, and I was going to ask unanimous consent for three minutes to reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachussetts. I will conclude within my time. I thought the gentleman was about to ask me a question. Now, Mr. Chairman, one of the great grievances of the people of this country is because of the duty on hides. If we modify our tariff upon hides, or repeal it, then the commerce with the South American countries which produce hides will be stimulated, and by receiving the hides of these countries into the United States we will gain in return a market in those countries for American manufactures which will be of great benefit both to the United States and to those countries.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman why the Democratic party as soon as it came into power repealed the greatest and best reciprocal treaty with those countries that we ever had. I mean the treaty we had with Brazil, negotiated in 1890. Almost the first act the Democratic party did was to abrogate that reciprocal treaty.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I can not answer the gentleman's question without assuming that what the gentleman states is the fact, and I have no knowledge that it is a fact. I will say that since the Dingley tariff has been adopted the Democratic party has labored constantly to get reciprocal tariff treaties with other countries, but the Republican party has persistently opposed it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit, I want to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania asked why the Democrats repealed the treaty which he thinks was so valuable, I will ask him why his party has not put it back on the statute book?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Because they can never get such a chance again.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This is the first time I have ever heard a Republican acknowledge that the Republican party couldn't do anything.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to object to the gentleman's request, but I want to make a parliamentary inquiry, and then make a request of my own. Who has the close of the debate on this proposition?

Mr. TAWNEY. Nobody has. We are proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to suggest that the gentleman from Missouri desires a little time on this amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want the gentleman from Minnesota to have five minutes and then I want ten minutes, and if he prefers it I will speak first. Or if he prefers to speak first I am perfectly willing.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman can make his request for unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then I ask for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks that he may proceed for ten minutes after the gentleman from Minnesota has had five minutes.

Mr. WATSON. I shall not object to that provided the gentleman from Minnesota can have ten minutes, and after that I shall object to further discussion on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Minnesota proceeding for ten minutes, to be followed by the gentleman from Missouri ten minutes?

Mr. OLMSTED. I think the request was that the gentleman from Missouri have ten minutes, to be followed by the gentleman from Minnesota with ten minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not care which way it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Missouri proceeding for ten minutes, followed by the gentleman from Minnesota for ten minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the proposition here that is pending in the bill is that we appropriate $60,000 to send delegates to an international conference to be held at Rio de Janeiro, which sum is to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of State. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is that this money shall not be available unless reciprocity with South American countries is made a part and parcel of the programme to be discussed at that conference. I am in favor of the conference. I am in favor of the amendment. I am in favor of every legitimate measure to increase our trade with foreign countries. We have an enormous home market, but we need more foreign markets for our surplus. Surely the Congress has a right to say how the money shall be expended. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], in charge of this bill, said that the principal object of this conference is to discuss the Monroe doctrine. Well, the Monroe doctrine is the only proposition ever enunciated by man that the entire American people agree upon. As far as we are concerned it needs no discussion. We know what it means, and we intend that the whole world shall accept our interpretation of it, for it is our doctrine—the American doctrine. With our present and our increasing strength the Monroe doctrine does not amount to as much to us as it did when we were a feeble folk. When it was first enunciated it was a proposition necessary to our continued prosperity and growth, if not to our existence. We will maintain it at all hazards for the good of all concerned. If our South and Central American brethren have not found out by this time that the Monroe doctrine is more for their benefit than ours at present and for the future, they have not very much mental acuteness. We have been trying to cultivate friendly relations with those peoples ever since the days of John Quincy Adams's Administration, when they had a Panama Congress. Blaine originated the Pan-American Congress. I undertake to say without fear of successful contradiction that it is vastly more important to cultivate closer trade relations with Central and South America than it is to have an academic discussion as to the benefits of the Monroe doctrine. That is especially true with reference to the Mississippi Valley and the trans-Mississippi country. From the Rio Grande clear to the Cape there is a great and growing civilization. The resources of that vast region are just beginning to be developed. If we establish correct trade relations with those peoples down there, we will have the largest market for our manufactured articles that there is on the face of the earth.

We will have an all-water route from Pittsburg and St. Paul and Fort Benton to South and Central America, by which we can ship our products of every sort and in huge quantities. The Mississippi and its tributaries constitute the cheapest and shortest route to South and Central American ports. In addition to our raw materials and manufactured articles, we should ship them American machinery for the purpose of manufacturing and for development generally. If we had as assiduously cultivated commercial relations with those nations as we ought to have done in the last thirty years, to-day the vast majority of the commerce of all these Latin-American states would be ours and ours for all time to come. Of all the great commercial nations we are their nearest neighbor and should enjoy the bulk of the trade with them. Criminations and recriminations about who has been in favor of reciprocity in days gone by do no good here. I do not care a bawbee what the Republicans thought about it fifteen or twenty years ago, and I do not care a straw what the Democrats thought about it ten or fifteen years ago. We are not legislating here to-day by reason of any man's opinion and conduct a decade ago. I know this: that a Republican Congress believed in 1897 that reciprocity was a good thing. I know that President McKinley appointed John A. Kasson, of Iowa, an eminent Republican, to negotiate reciprocity treaties. I know that Mr. Kasson negotiated the treaties, several of them. I know that they were sent to the United States Senate with recommendations from both President McKinley and President Roosevelt that they should be ratified, and I know that the Senate never ratified a blessed one of them and that they are sleeping the sleep of death in the pigeonholes of the Senate Chamber now. I am in favor of the Rio de Janeiro conference because it is to the interest of the entire American people, particularly those who live beyond the Alleghenies, to cultivate friendly trade relations with the peoples at our very doors. As far as I am individually concerned, I am in favor of turning this international conference into a discussion of trade relations between the nations participating in it. What political effect it would have I do not know and I do not care. Its general effect upon this country can not be doubted. It would be all for good. Our New England brethren want reciprocity with Canada. The Texas brethren want reciprocity with Mexico. My friend from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] has a proposition of his own that seems to me to contain a good deal of wisdom, and that is for a continental tariff scheme that will take in the British possessions on the north and the Central American states clear down to the Isthmus of Panama on the south; and if we can not secure reciprocity with all creation at once, I will take the Burgess proposition as a half loaf that is better than no bread at all.

I would like to hear some man suggest some sensible reason why if we are going to spend $60,000 in participating in an international conference, it shall not be made to do some good to the American people. If we are not going to discuss trade relations, our delegation to Rio de Janeiro will do just exactly as much good and no more as our delegation to Algeciras—and I am not to say, incidentally, that I think that man Raisuli, who kidnaped Perdicaris, is missing the greatest opportunity of his life by not kidnaping that entire crowd that is over there at Algeciras. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAHAM. If the gentleman will allow me, I would suggest to him that he would first have to cross the Mediterranean in order to do it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I suppose they have ships over there in which he could cross. This is a plain business proposition. Increase our trade with Mexico; increase it with all the South and Central American states. The only reason on earth that Mexico is more stable than the rest of the Latin-American states is that there are lots of Americans down there, and wherever there is an American he is a standing, living bond to keep the peace. Our relations would become closer with Mexico except for the artificial barrier that has been erected by these high tariff laws. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Missouri. Their remarks recall an instance that I witnessed upon this floor in the Fifty-third Congress when we had under consideration the so-called "Wilson tariff law." At that time the Representatives of the Democratic party were so absolutely hostile to the policy of reciprocity that their distinguished leader, Mr. Wilson, of West Virginia, was not satisfied with the ordinary provisions in the Wilson bill repealing the existing tariff laws, but in order to emphasize their hostility to reciprocity Mr. Wilson presented an amendment specifically repealing section 3 of the McKinley tariff law and all of the treaties with the South and Central American Republics, under which provision those treaties were negotiated. I therefore rejoice and welcome the Representatives of the Democratic party into the Republican party in so far as the Republican policy of reciprocity is concerned. I submit, however, that they have no justification for saying that because we are opposed to this amendment, which proposes to restrict and limit the action of American representatives in an international congress, we are thereby objecting even to a discussion or to an enactment of reciprocity legislation. This provision, Mr. Chairman, and the reason for our objection to it is because we do not believe that if we are to accomplish anything in this Pan-American Congress that the way to accomplish it is to send our delegates there with specific instructions as to what they shall consider and what they shall not consider. One of the primary objects of this bill——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have only a few minutes. I yield to the gentleman, however.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I offered this amendment and I am afraid the gentleman does not understand it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have read it and I understand it fully.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, is it not a fact that the programme for this conference is now in the course of preparation?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it not a fact that the Secretary of State would largely determine the subjects that will be discussed by this country?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know that is the fact. I presume that the representatives of this Government who are going down to attend this conference will be governed somewhat by the judgment of the Secretary of State, but this programme is being made up not by the Secretary of State nor by the representatives of this Government, but the programme is being made up by the representatives of the governments who are to participate in this conference, and I say it would not be wise, it would not even be courteous to the representatives of the foreign governments for us to attempt to restrict our representatives in the making up of the programme for consideration by this congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The men who are making up this programme are at present in Washington at work on it, are they not?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am so informed by the Secretary of State.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And if Congress puts this limitation upon this appropriation would it not insure a place on the programme for the discussion of reciprocal trade relations?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not any more, in my judgment, Mr. Chairman, than that subject is now assured a place in the programme. It is one of the primary objects of this congress, and I think, Mr. Chairman, that it would be unwise, it would be in poor taste, and would be an unwise policy for us to attempt in advance to fix a limitation within which our representatives must go when they are going to act in conjunction with the representatives of foreign governments concerning interests pertaining to our own as well as to their people, and for that reason I think that the amendment, Mr. Chairman, should be defeated.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest to him a limitation restricting our delegates and not restricting others in the same channel might defeat the whole object of the conference?

Mr. TAWNEY. Unquestionably that might be the result. That might be the effect of it. The very idea of our sending representatives into an international conference and then tying their hands with respect to the doing of certain things, of course, would afford the other representatives the opportunity of saying, "You come here with specific instructions; you are not competent to participate in a free conference concerning matters pertaining to the welfare of all the nations represented in this conference."

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. May I ask a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Does not the gentleman think that if the Congress of the United States instructs its delegates to discuss any specific subject, such as, according to the terms of this amendment, to discuss the question of reciprocal trade relations, that the representatives of the other nations will be courteous enough to permit that discussion; and does not he believe they will be glad to hear that discussion?

Mr. TAWNEY. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that independent of any instruction on the part of the Congress of the United States that this will be one of the primary topics of discussion in this proposed Pan-American Congress.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Why leave it to conjecture when you can make it certain?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not believe it would be left to conjecture. I believe that we ought to leave this entirely to the discretion of the representatives we send to this congress. It is entirely unusual for a government sending a representative to an international conference to specifically instruct him in advance as to what subject he shall or shall not consider. This amendment, if it has any utility at all, it is in the State of Massachusetts, where the question of reciprocity seems to be uppermost in the minds of all the people, regardless of political affiliation. I believe, just as much as the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Missouri, in encouraging and developing our trade relations with the South American countries, and that being one of the primary objects of this convention, I say it is almost silly for Congress to say that it must consider that particular subject. I therefore hope the amendment will be defeated, and in this connection I wish to insert as a part of my remarks the following colloquy between Mr. Dingley, of Maine, and Mr. Wilson, of West Virginia, respecting the repeal of section 3 of the McKinley tariff, to be found on page 1117 of the RECORD of the second session of the Fifty-third Congress:

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"On page 141: That section 50 be amended by inserting after the figures 50, 'That section 3 of an act approved October 1, 1890, entitled "An act to reduce the revenue, to equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes," is hereby repealed.'"

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The effect of that is to repeal the language of section 3 of the McKinley bill, which authorizes retaliatory proclamations by the President.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from West Virginia if this is a provision distinctly repealing all the reciprocity provisions of the existing law, as I understand?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. This is a provision distinctly repealing section 3 of the McKinley bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is the reciprocity provision?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. That is a reciprocity provision.

Mr. DINGLEY. The effect of this amendment is not only to destroy reciprocity, but to emphasize the fact of its destruction.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. It is the understanding of the committee that the bill as originally presented effects that repeal; but in order that there may be no question about it they put in this provision distinctly repealing that section.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Wilson] surrender the floor?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, by the amendment just offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Wilson], it is proposed to expressly repeal section 3 of the present tariff law, commonly known as the reciprocity clause. This proposition, we are told, emanates from the Democrats on the Ways and Means Committee, and is another evidence, if more were needed, of the utter disregard which those gentlemen have for the interests of the West, and especially for the interests of the agriculturists of that great section of our country. They have reported a tariff bill which greatly reduces the duty or places on the free list the products of the farm, and almost every article in which the farmers are interested, at the same time retaining a duty on the products of the eastern manufacturer for the express purpose of affording them adequate protection.

[Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BRICK. May I ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. BRICK. I am a little at a loss, I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota, as to the object in offering this amendment. I will ask you whether there is any question in the world that this congress was provided for or contemplated unless it was to consider the fostering of trade relations?

Mr. TAWNEY. That was the primary object of the conference, in my judgment, and I am so informed by the State Department.

Mr. BRICK. Is there any question in the world but that that will be carried out?

Mr. TAWNEY. None.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that that does not appear from the statement of the State Department before the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If that is true, what objection have you to putting in this amendment?

Mr. BRICK. I might answer that as I might answer almost any practical question: That here is a conference to be held; that we will not attempt to give the details of all the things that shall be considered; that it would be impossible that we should examine all that beforehand, but that we will trust our representatives that they will carry out the objects and purposes of entering upon an international conference in that convention.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman just one question. The gentleman from Minnesota has stated that it is unusual to instruct delegates. Now, I want the gentleman to search his memory and read up on that point. Is it not a fact that it is the universal practice to instruct delegates?

Mr. TAWNEY. It has never been done. We have had two Pan-American congresses, and never have given specific instructions to the delegates concerning any subject that that congress was called together to consider.

I want to say one word further. The representatives of all the governments that are to participate in this congress are now considering the subjects that will be considered by the Pan-American Congress in July next. They are making up a programme of the subjects; and hence I think it would be very unwise for Congress to inject itself into their deliberations as to what the programme of the Pan-American Congress should be.

Mr. LITTAUER. I call for a vote. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Division!

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers, to save time.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York, Mr. LITTAUER, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. FITZGERALD, will please act as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 98.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

To enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to properly carry out the objects of the act to regulate commerce and all acts and amendments supplementary thereto, including the joint resolution "instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies in coal and oil, and report on the same from time to time," approved March 7, 1906, the sum of $45,000 is hereby transferred to said Commission, and made available for the remainder of the fiscal year 1906, from the balance of the appropriation of $500,000 for the enforcement of "An act to regulate commerce" and all acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, and other acts mentioned in said appropriation, made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1904, and reappropriated for the fiscal year 1906 by the sundry civil appropriation act, under the Department of Justice: Provided, That the total amount that may be expended in the employment of counsel by the Interstate Commerce Commission shall not exceed the sum of $45,000 during the fiscal year 1906.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert on page 2, line 25, after the word "Provided," "That not more than the sum of $10,000 may be used in investigating the illegal issuance and use of free passes, free tickets, and free transportation on railroads engaged in interstate and foreign commerce; And provided further."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I must make the point of order against that, that it is not germane to the appropriation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is just as germane as it is possible for the English language to make it. The paragraph of the bill starts out by saying:

To enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to properly carry out the objects of the act to regulate commerce and all acts and amendments supplementary thereto.

The commerce act alluded to is the commerce act of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce"—the act the paragraph alludes to.

Mr. LITTAUER. Read further.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Section 22 of the act of February 4, 1887, is the section which, with other sections of the law, prohibits the issuance of free transportation except to railroad officials and their employees. This amendment is just as germane as anything can make it, and it is a limitation upon the appropriation. Pending the investigation of that, while I am perfectly satisfied that it is perfectly germane——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have this to say: The appropriation starts in line 7, as I said, with these words:

To enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to properly carry out the objects of the act to regulate commerce, etc., "including the joint resolution instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examination into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies in coal and oil."

The act of February 4, 1887, is an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," and section 22 of that act is the one which covers the question of free transportation. I have the law here, Mr. Chairman. Shall I read the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to see it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will send it up and let the Chair read it. You will see the title to the act and the particular paragraph there, section 22, which has been amended, as the Chair will see from the paragraph, the amendments being printed in the annotated copy of the law which I have just handed to the Chair.

Mr. LITTAUER. The purpose of this paragraph is simply to provide for the carrying out of the resolution referred to and the statement, "To enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to properly carry out the objects of the act to regulate commerce," is simply a method of stating the object for the appropriation, or to give a basis to add on, as the subject of the joint resolution, to examine into railroad discriminations in coal and oil.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What does the gentleman mean by the language in the bill, the paragraph I want to amend, to wit:

To enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to properly carry out the objects of the act to regulate commerce?

The amendment I offer is clearly germane. That is as clear as the noonday sunshine. I will read the title of the act of 1887 again: "An act to regulate commerce"—the very words of the paragraph. The law, section 22 of the act of February 4, 1887, reads as follows:

SEC. 22. Free or reduced rates—Excursions—Mileage—Commutation rates—Remedies cumulative.—That nothing in this act shall prevent the carriage, storage, or handling of property free or at reduced rates for the United States, State, or municipal governments, or for charitable purposes, or to and from expositions for exhibition thereat, or the free carriage of destitute and homeless persons transported by charitable societies, and the necessary agents employed in such transportation, or the issuance of mileage, excursion, or commutation passenger tickets; nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit any common carrier from giving reduced rates to ministers of religion or to municipal governments for the transportation of indigent persons, or to inmates of the National Homes or State Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and of Soldiers and Sailors' Orphan Homes, including those about to enter and those returning home after discharge under arrangements with the boards of managers of said Homes.

Nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent railroads from giving free carriage to their own officers and employees, or to prevent the principal officers of any railroad company or companies from exchanging passes or tickets with other railroad companies for their officers and employees; and nothing in this act contained shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but the provisions of this act are in addition to such remedies: Provided, That no pending litigation shall in any way be affected by this act [as amended March 2, 1889]: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall prevent the issuance of joint interchangeable 5,000-mile tickets, with special privileges as to the amount of free baggage that may be carried under mileage tickets of 1,000 or more miles.

But before any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, issue any such joint interchangeable mileage tickets with special ... as aforesaid, it shall file with the Interstate Commerce Com... copies of the joint tariffs of rates, fares, or charges, on which ... interchangeable mileage tickets are to be based, together with ... tions of the amount of free baggage permitted to be carried ... such tickets, in the same manner as common carriers are re... to do with regard to other joint rates by section 6 of this act; ... the provisions of said section 6 relating to joint rates, fares, ... shall be observed by said common carriers and enforced ... Interstate Commerce Commission, as fully with regard to such ... interchangeable mileage tickets as with regard to other joint ... rates, and charges referred to in said section 6. It shall be un... for any common carrier that has issued or authorized to be is... such joint interchangeable mileage tickets to demand, collect, ... from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for ... portation of persons or baggage under such joint interchangeable ... tickets than that required by the rate, fare, or charge specified ... copies of the joint tariff of rates, fares, or charges filed with the ... in force at the time. The provisions of section 10 of this ... apply to any violations of the requirements of this act (cov... laws of 1895, ch. 61, approved February 8, 1895).

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, just one word. As was said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], this appropriation is made clearly and expressly for the purpose of carrying out the resolution adopted by the House a short time ago, the title of which is included in the paragraph—that is, instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies in oil and coal. Now, a limitation providing that not more than $10,000 should be expended for coal or oil, or providing that that much should be expended for the investigation of either one of those subjects, would be germane; but this provision requires that $10,000 of this appropriation shall be expended for the investigation of the pass question, which is not at all the subject of that resolution and not at all germane to the resolution, and therefore I think the point of order is clearly well taken.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have this to say in reference to the point of order, that if the contention of the gentleman in charge of the bill and of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] is correct, then certainly the wording of this paragraph is unfortunate. It seems to me that the purpose of this appropriation is to provide means for an investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission under the terms of the act to regulate commerce and all acts amendatory thereof. That is the purpose of this appropriation. Then there is added to this the words:

Including the joint resolution instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examination into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies in coal and oil.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not see how it can be argued here that the sole purpose of this appropriation is to investigate the matter of coal and oil rebates or abuses or improper charges, in violation of the interstate-commerce act, because that is only made a part of the general provision, and it is only one of the many duties that the Interstate Commerce Commission is called upon to perform. I can not see, nor do I think it can be successfully argued, that the sole business here is to investigate the coal and oil business. Any violation of the act mentioned is included in the scope of the investigation to be had. If the point of order has to be sustained, it must be held that this provision applies to the investigation of the coal and oil business and to nothing else. A casual reading of the provision shows that this is not true.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph of the bill, as the Chair will see by the reading of the bill, provides:

To enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to properly carry out the objects of the act—

That is, the commerce act of February 4, 1887—

to regulate commerce and all acts and amendments supplemental thereto—

The bill does not stop there—

including the joint resolution instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examination into the subject of railroad discrimination and monopolies in coal and oil.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, down in line 18 you will find the words "an act to regulate commerce" are quoted, and allude, of course, to the act of February 4, 1887; and then it proceeds:

all acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto and other acts mentioned in said appropriation made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1904.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the need for this investigation is so apparent to any fair man that I will not discuss that, but will leave the point of order with the Chair, with this statement, that no language can possibly make it any plainer than this bill is written; that this appropriation is to carry out the "act to regulate commerce and all acts and amendments supplemental thereto, including the joint resolution."

The committee was unhappy in its use of language if it intended for this bill simply to enforce the provisions of this "joint resolution" only.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this proposition is to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to do what Congress has directed it to do in respect to investigating the ownership of coal and oil lands and the relation of the railroads of the country in the United States to that ownership. The reason for the reference in the bill to the interstate-commerce act is that without referring to that act it would be necessary for the Interstate Commerce Commission to provide an entirely new organization for the purpose of conducting the investigation. It could not use any part of its present organization, for the reason that the Comptroller of the Treasury and the Auditor for that Department would not pass their accounts. Therefore in order to make it possible for the Commission to use any part of the organization now in existence—which it can do without additional expense—we have in this bill referred to the general interstate-commerce act, although the appropriation is specifically and exclusively for the purpose of carrying on this investigation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But, as a matter of fact, the bill states it is to enforce the commerce act, "including" this joint resolution. The gentleman from Minnesota says this would require a new organization to carry it out. The Commission has the organization there and haven't carried out the law as to unlawful free passes, and I want the law executed, and limit this amount of $10,000 to do so (all needed, possibly), and let them proceed to execute the law. If the committee reporting this bill had wanted to confine this appropriation to the coal and oil investigation only it could have easily had this paragraph read in this way:

To enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to properly carry out the object of the joint resolution, instructing the Commission so and so.

Instead of that the bill reads to execute the commerce act and this resolution.

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Very well.

Mr. TAWNEY. Had we provided, as the gentleman now suggests, entirely omitting any reference to the interstate-commerce act, then would it not have been necessary for the Interstate Commerce Commission to have provided, under the resolution authorizing this investigation, for an entire new organization to carry on the investigation? By referring to the interstate-commerce act, the Commission is enabled to utilize a part of the force that it now has.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think the argument of the gentleman from Minnesota is not sound. The law allows such an investigation, and this resolution directs this investigation to oil and coal and the general enforcement of the act of 1887. The Commission has all the machinery it needs, and all it needs now is the money. It merely instructs them to proceed, generally, and on oil and coal particularly. You have told them to proceed under the interstate-commerce act of 1887, and particularly to investigate oil, etc., which this joint resolution in question calls for.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized to employ such temporary employees, except clerks and stenographers, as it may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of said joint resolution, approved March 7, 1906, and to fix their compensation.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 67, strike out the words "except clerks and stenographers;" and at the end of line 9 insert "but clerks and stenographers shall be appointed only on certification by the Civil Service Commission."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

For the collection and disposal of garbage and dead animals, miscellaneous refuse and ashes from private residences in the city of Washington and the more densely populated suburbs; for collection and disposal of night soil in the District of Columbia, and for the payment of necessary inspection, livery of horses, and incidental expenses, $40,640.42, one-half of which shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire if the gentleman can give us some information of a more definite nature as to what particular salaries and labor is referred to in this paragraph?

Mr. LITTAUER. All salaries and labor authorized by resolution of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman if included in that there is anything for special stenographers before the different committees of the House?

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe any resolution has been passed for such service, though I do not claim to be fully advised.

Mr. NORRIS. So that the gentleman may understand me better, I wish to state that the regular committee stenographers, four in number, sometimes select, when they are busy, some one to take their places before different committees when there is a demand made for additional stenographers.

Mr. LITTAUER. They are authorized by law to engage stenographers.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I understand. I did not mean to say that they did it illegally.

Mr. LITTAUER. And the compensation of such stenographers is provided for.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not finding any fault with it, but I want to know whether included in this item there is any expenditure of that class.

Mr. LITTAUER. I have no such specified item before me, but I take it for granted that there may be such.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, the other day, when we had the regular appropriation committee bill up for consideration, the statement was made, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] made a motion to cut down the appropriation for these four committee stenographers, that all services of other stenographers who were brought in when they were busy was paid for out of the salaries of these particular stenographers.

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, I think the gentleman is mistaken. It is paid for out of the contingent fund.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that is right, but I think the statement was made by several gentleman—I believe by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], and also by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I will answer the question. The statement made by myself was that the committee stenographers paid for the service of writing out on the typewriter the notes which they take in the committee rooms during the hearings—not for the additional expert stenographic service, but the service incident to the transcription of their notes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] also made the statement that they are not reimbursed for that amount. The sundry civil bill contains an item of over $7,000 this year for reimbursing the committee stenographers for that service, and it has always been the practice of Congress.

Mr. TAWNEY. If that is the fact I did not so understand it.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is in the general deficiency bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They are always reimbursed for that expenditure.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood that is right. I only wanted to call the attention of the House to the fact that a great many Members of the House were under the impression that these committee stenographers selected by the regular stenographers were paid out of the salary of $5,000 a year that went to the committee stenographers.

Mr. LITTAUER. The committee stenographers are not selected by the regular stenographers.

Mr. NORRIS. But the gentleman does not understand what I mean. I do not mean these reporters here, but there are four committee stenographers.

Mr. LITTAUER. And they are selected by the Speaker.

Mr. NORRIS. And sometimes they are busy and can not do all the business of the different committees and they have to select somebody else.

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not think that they select the additional service. The Clerk of the House provides for it, and it is paid for.

Mr. NORRIS. It was the impression obtained by many that they paid for that, and I wanted merely to call attention to the fact, so that those who had misunderstood might understand properly that these were all paid outside of the regular salary of these stenographers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill as amended favorably.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLCOTT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17359, the urgent deficiency bill—and had directed him to report the same with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the bill as amended be passed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTAUER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. CALDERHEAD was granted leave of absence, for ten days, on account of important business.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President; which was read, referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit to you herewith the report of the American members of the International Waterways Commission regarding the preservation of Niagara Falls. I also submit to you certain letters from the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War, including memoranda, showing what has been attempted by the Department of State in the effort to secure the preservation of the falls by treaty.

I earnestly recommend that Congress enact into law the suggestions of the American members of the International Waterways Commission for the preservation of Niagara Falls without waiting for the negotiation of a treaty. The law can be put in such form that it will lapse, say in three years, provided that during that time no international agreement has been reached. But in any event I hope that this nation will make it evident that it is doing all in its power to preserve the great scenic wonder, the existence of which, unharmed, should be a matter of pride to every dweller on this continent.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 27, 1906.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. LITTAUER, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—Mr. OLCOTT in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of assistant treasurer at Cincinnati: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,250; assistant cashier, $1,800; bookkeeper, $1,800; receiving teller, $1,500; interest clerk, and five clerks, at $1,200 each; two clerks, at $1,000 each; clerk and stenographer, $720; clerk and watchman, $840; night watchman, $600; day watchman, $600; in all, $23,810.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PRINCE. To make points of order against this paragraph or section. The first point of order is against the entire paragraph beginning on line 7 and ending line 18 at the word "dollars," page 63, because the paragraph changes existing law. The second edition of the Revised Statutes of 1878, page 713, section 3612, reads as follows:

There shall be appointed in the office of the assistant treasurer at Cincinnati one cashier at $2,000 a year, one clerk at $1,800, one clerk at $1,500, two clerks at $1,200 each, two clerks at $1,000 each, one messenger at $600, two watchmen, one at $720 and one at $240.

There is a statute of the United States. This legislative act seeks to change existing law, and I make the point of order that the entire paragraph seeks to change section 3612 of title 11 of the public statutes of the United States. I make the further specific point of order, if the Chairman should see fit to hold that there is not enough poison in this paragraph to kill the entire paragraph—then I make the specific additional point of order, on line 9, page 63, that they have increased the salary $250; that while the statutory salary of the cashier is fixed by law at $2,000 they have increased it to $2,250. Beginning line 10 of the same page, they have by this legislative act again changed existing law by adding a bookkeeper at $1,800. Beginning on line 12 of the same page with the words "interest clerk, and five clerks at $1,200 each," they have added four clerks, making a change of existing law. Again, on the same page, line 14, "clerk and stenographer, $720," is new legislation in contravention of the law. In lines 15 and 16 they have increased, beginning with the word "clerks" and ending with the word "dollars," on line 16, the salaries of the watchmen $120. Now, it is so difficult to segregate all these items that I ask for a ruling as against the entire paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. Except the provision increasing the salary of one employee to the extent of $250 per annum, what, if any, difference is there between that paragraph and the current appropriation law for the clerical service of the subtreasury at Cincinnati?

Mr. PRINCE. I am inclined to think, as I recall it now without looking it up, that it does make one increase as to the former current legislation, but it has been held time out of mind by the present occupant of the chair during the discussion of this bill, as well as by other occupants of the chair, that any reiteration in the legislative enactment of a current appropriation does not have the force of law, and does not change the statutes of the United States, and I am standing by the law. I say that if the Appropriations Committee has the right by a legislative act to change the statutes of the United States in one paricular, they have the right to come into this House and change the entire statutes of the United States by an appropriation bill, and if they have the right to change a section of the law in one instance, there is no provision of the laws of the United States but what can be subject to their will, and the rest of us might as well go out of this House and let them conduct the entire legislative business of this Congress.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the point of order rests primarily upon the increase of the salary of one clerk or employee in the subtreasury at Cincinnati. I am aware of the fact that the gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order as to all of these positions which are now carried in the current appropriation law in excess of those specified in the section of the Revised Statutes to which he referred. I want to call the Chair's attention to the fact that this section of the Revised Statutes is a provision of the preceding appropriation law or the current appropriation law at the time of the revision of those statutes. These statutes are merely prima facie evidence of what the law is. I have here the provision of law authorizing the subtreasury at Cincinnati. Section 5 of an act approved March 3, 1873:

That there shall be appointed an assistant treasurer of the United States to be located in the city of Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio; such assistant treasurer shall be appointed in like manner, for like terms, and be subject to all the provisions of law to which the other assistant treasurers of the United States are subject.

This provision, therefore, originally authorizing the appointment of an assistant treasurer and the establishment of a subtreasury in the city of Cincinnati makes that subtreasury subject to all the provisions of law in regard to subtreasuries of the United States.

The point I want to make is that under this original law of 1873 every subtreasury in the United States is a part of the Treasury Department of the Government. It is not an establishment distinct and separate from the Treasury Department, but made by Congressional enactment a part of the Treasury, and not an institution outside of the Department. I refer to the act approved August 6, 1846, and I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this was two years after the enactment of this statute dividing the employees of the Government, or the clerks in the Government service, into four classes, and providing for the appointment of messengers, watchmen, and such other employees as may be necessary. This act reads:

Whereas by the fourth section of the act entitled "An act to establish a Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1789, it was provided that it shall be the duty of the Treasurer to receive and keep the moneys of the United States, and to disburse the same upon warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, countersigned by the Comptroller, and recorded by the Register, and not otherwise; and

Whereas it is found necessary to make further provisions to enable the Treasurer the better to carry into effect the intent of the said section in relation to the receiving and disbursing the moneys of the United States: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the rooms prepared and provided in the new Treasury building at the seat of government for the use of the Treasurer of the United States, his assistants, and clerks, and occupied by them, and also the fireproof vaults and safes erected in said rooms for the keeping of the public moneys in the possession and under the immediate control of said Treasurer—and such other apartments as are provided in this act as places of deposit of the public money are hereby constituted and declared to be the Treasury of the United States.

Now, here is the language that includes the subtreasuries of the United States in the Treasury Department of the Government:

Not an independent branch of the Treasury of the United States, but are declared—"constituted and declared"—to be not a part, but to be the Treasury of the United States. Then follows the enumeration of the different places provided for the various subtreasuries for the better convenience of the Government in receiving and disbursing the public funds. That is what our subtreasuries are created for, and they are made subject to the provisions of this act, the subtreasuries and the Treasury here in Washington constituting the Treasury of the United States.

Now, if it is the Treasury of the United States, Mr. Chairman, we are certainly, under section 169 of the Revised Statutes, entitled to provide—that is, this House can provide—for as many clerks—that is, the clerks designated, or other employees—as the Department may deem necessary to carry on this branch of the public business.

Now, these subtreasuries, I repeat, being the Treasury of the United States, there would be no question, Mr. Chairman, of the right of this House to appropriate a lump sum for this service. We can appropriate a lump sum for the carrying on of this service in every subtreasury in the United States, and it would be in order. Why? Because the Congress of the United States has authorized this service. The Congress of the United States has expressly authorized the service in each individual case, and thereby impliedly authorized the necessary appropriation for carrying on the service. If we can appropriate a lump sum for the purpose of carrying on this service, the Secretary of the Treasury, the head of the Department, would have authority to employ as many clerks as he deemed necessary for the performance of that service, and pay them such salaries as he in his judgment deemed necessary. There can be no question in regard to his authority to do this. Do you mean to tell me that an administrative officer of this Government can do that under a lump-sum appropriation which the Congress of the United States can not do? And yet to sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois would be equivalent to declaring that, although Congress may appropriate for this service in a lump sum, and the Secretary of the Treasury has the power to expend that appropriation by employing such clerks as the service, in his judgment, may demand, and pay them such salaries as he sees fit, yet the House of Representatives can not, under its rules, segregate the appropriation and designate the number of clerks and provide specifically for their salaries. The effect of such a ruling would be to say that the House of Representatives can not exercise its constitutional function of appropriating specifically for a public service authorized by law which an administrative officer of the Government would have authority to provide for. Such a construction would be equivalent to saying that the House of Representatives, that must originate all appropriations, was not the power to provide specifically for a service that Congress has itself expressly authorized, which would be a reductio ad absurdum.

I maintain, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that this service having been established by an act of Congress, as I have shown, it is entirely competent and within the rule invoked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] for us to provide specifically how much of the appropriation we are authorized to make for this service shall go to the payment of salaries of particular clerks, and what the specific salary in each case shall be. There is no other rational or logical conclusion to be drawn from the fact that this service is established by law, that Congress has the power to appropriate by a lump sum for the purpose of carrying on that service, and that the administrative officer of the Government under such appropriation would have the power of distributing the appropriation in the payment of salaries and such other services as he, in his judgment, might deem necessary for that purpose. That being the case, and this being the Treasury of the United States and not an independent organization, I respectfully submit that this House—not the Committee on Appropriations, but the House itself—has the power to consider the question of how many clerks shall be provided for and what their compensation shall be, independent of whether there is any specific statute authorizing the appointment of a certain number of clerks. If we have not that right, if this House has not that right, then what is the logical conclusion? The logical conclusion is that this House must confine itself to rewriting and passing current appropriation bills, sending such bills to the Senate of the United States, allowing that body to originate all new appropriations, and to that extent we surrender our constitutional right and duty to originate all appropriation bills.

In my judgment, this House can not legally adopt a rule that would have that effect. If it has that effect, then the rule is in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I stand by the United States statutes. I have read the statutes to the Chairman. As I recall, not long ago an objection was made by some members of the Committee on Appropriations to some provision for the appropriation for clerks in the military bill, on the ground that while they were clerks to be appointed at the departments and divisions of the different offices connected with the military establishments of the Government, yet they were not clerks to be appointed here in Washington under the Departments, and therefore, being outside of the Departments here in Washington, they were in the nature of separate and distinct bureaus or divisions, aside from the District of Columbia. I had returned from a sick bed to come into this House. I was not present at the time that the bill was prepared in the committee room, but I heard the discussion on this floor, and I heard the reading of an opinion, I think by the Attorney-General, holding what were Departments here in Washington and what were regarded as divisions outside of the Departments in Washington. Now, here is the law creating these places—for instance, at Cincinnati—and specifically telling what shall be the salary of the chief in charge, and specifically stating what shall be the personnel of that office and the salaries that shall be paid them. Has there been any modification of that by this House from that day to this by statute?

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think the gentleman fails to make a distinction between an institution which is the Treasury of the United States, as a subtreasury is declared by law to be, and a service that is entirely separate and distinct from departmental service here at the seat of government.

Mr. PRINCE. Very well; this is not the Treasury.

Mr. TAWNEY. The law so declares.

Mr. PRINCE. It is the subtreasury, and these are separate and distinct, and the bill itself regards it as the office of the Assistant Treasurer, and by the bill, on page 61, they call it the Independent Treasury. If we have been misled by what they call the Independent Treasury, if we have been misled by the law, which I do not think we have, it is strange that we find it out for the first time that it is the Treasury and not the Independent Treasury, as the bill declares it to be.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is merely the running head of the paragraph. That is not a part of the provision of the law.

Mr. PRINCE. Now, I insist that here is the law, and I further insist that here are the rules of this House. On page 281 it is provided:

No appropriation shall be reported—

Reported! What does that mean? It means that the Appropriations Committee of this House, if they obey the rules of the House, shall not report, let alone ask the passage in this House of any bill in violation of the rules of the House. They are told at the door of that committee room to report no provision on an appropriation bill—

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto—

Let any gentleman on the floor of this House as a member of the Committee of the Whole rise to make an amendment to this bill, and how promptly they say it is contrary to Rule XXI, paragraph 2, because it is an amendment thereto—for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or any amendment thereto.

I still contend that this entire provision is subject to a point of order, and I further contend that the particular items I have mentioned are subject to a point of order. The gentleman from Minnesota confesses, as I understand him—perhaps I do not—that there is one provision contrary to the previous current legislative act. Does not the gentleman say that there is one?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not. The provision for increase of salary is not out of order for the reason that it is entirely within the discretion of this House, the subtreasury at Cincinnati being the Treasury of the United States, an institution created by law, we are authorized to legislate for it.

Mr. PRINCE. Well, Mr. Chairman, I deny that proposition.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois makes the point that this is new legislation. We find that the act referred to by him was passed in 1870, more than thirty-three years ago. The number of clerks or officers mentioned therein were evidently sufficient for the transaction of the public business at that time.

We all know, Mr. Chairman, that since that time this Government has expanded and that it has become necessary in furtherance of the public business to employ additional clerks and other help. I contend that in this instance the right to appoint was with the executive department of the Government and is inherent. The executive department having exercised that power, then, for the purpose it is intended, it has the force and effect of a law, leaving it for the Congress to make the necessary appropriations for these appointees. If the Congress refuses to make the appropriation, we shall find that these employees will refuse to serve, but it will not affect the validity of the appointments.

But assuming for a moment that there was no power in the Executive to make these appointments, but the Congress having continued from year to year to make the appropriations, ought it not be estopped from asserting the invalidity of the appropriations, and ought this Congress at this time stultify itself?

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that by the very action of this Congress in making the fiscal appropriations of last year as well as the preceding years, it has acquiesced in these appointments and ratified them and made them a part of the statute. I submit, therefore, that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, one further suggestion with reference to the suggestion. On page 27, section 169, it says: "Each head of the Department is authorized to employ in his Department a certain number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law."

If the Chairman will notice, I have objected to some that could not be regarded in the classified service, even if the Chairman should go so far, as it seems to me he can not, as to hold that this is a part of the Treasury, because there are clerks there to which I object that are above the classified service. Therefore they are clearly subject to a point of order, and the Chair in a ruling heretofore said that when it referred to messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees it referred to a grade below the classified grade.

Mr. TAWNEY. But the Chairman did not so rule. The Chair made no ruling on that point. He was about to rule one way or the other on the question when we discovered the existence of an express statute authorizing the eight chiefs of divisions in the Sixth Auditor's office in the Treasury Department, and thereupon the Chair declined to rule on that question, the question of whether or not "any such other employees as may be necessary," includes those of a lower grade than laborers. That has not been decided.

Mr. PRINCE. Oh, no; not lower than laborers; but a lower grade than clerks in the classified service.

Mr. TAWNEY. Or a higher grade. On that point, when the point is reached, I desire to be heard because I have a statute directly bearing upon the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] to say that he had a statute upon that proposition?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have a statute passed two years subsequent to the enactment of that statute cited by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], being section 169 of the Revised Statutes. The legislative appropriation bill following two years thereafter appropriated for the public service in lump sums. I thought I had the sections here, but I find I have not. It reads in substance thus: "For the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury and such clerks, messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, laborers, and other employees as may be necessary, $51,000"—a lump-sum appropriation, leaving it entirely in the discretion of the head of the Department as to the number of clerks and their salaries, except as to the designation of those provided for by statute.

This shows conclusively, Mr. Chairman, that under the practically contemporaneous interpretation of this statute it was left to the discretion of the Department as to the designation of all other employees that might be required in the public service, for the reason that they appropriated for that service in a lump sum, specifying certain employees, and such other employees as in the judgment of the Department might be necessary to carry on the service authorized by Congress. Now, if it was deemed competent by the men who practically enacted that statute for the head of a Department to fix the designation of all employees in the Department, other than those expressly provided for, it is certainly competent for Congress to do the same thing when it is appropriating specifically for this service.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say one word only, and that is that no matter what may have been done in an appropriation bill in any Congress of the past, when no point was raised, the Chair ruled, when the military bill was under consideration, that such action had no bearing whatever when a proposition of that character happened to be before the Committee of the Whole House, and the mere fact that a provision would go into an appropriation bill without a point of order being raised gave it no standing in the future Congresses, if a point should be raised against it. So that the legislation that the gentleman refers to can have no bearing on this point of order. It seems to me that the one great question on this would be, Are these appointments made by the head of a Department or are they made by some outside power entirely independent of what the head of a Department may desire for his Department?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, just a word in reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL]. The bearing that this has upon the point of order is that it tends to show the construction when the men who enacted this statute placed upon it almost immediately after its enactment by vesting in the heads of Departments the discretion of determining the particular designation of all employees in the Departments, except those in the four classes named, and the laborers, messengers, and copyists. That discretion was left with the Secretary of the Treasury and the heads of the Departments. Now, that was not peculiar to the appropriation for that particular Department. I thought I had before me here the act of 1846, but I find I have not. I think the Chair has the volume, and if he will turn to the legislative act in that volume of the statute he will see that every appropriation for the public service in the Executive Departments of the Government was made at that time in lump sums, the only exception being the appropriations made for the Senate and the House of Representatives. There the salaries were specifically stated; but in every other instance the appropriation for the service in the Executive Departments was a lump-sum appropriation, leaving entirely to the judgment and discretion of the administrative officers the matter of designating the clerks employed in that service, and also fixing the salaries of all clerks except those that were fixed at that time by statute. Therefore, if that is competent under a lump-sum appropriation under the statute cited by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], it is certainly competent to-day for Congress to do the same thing. It would have been competent at that time for Congress to have specifically designated the positions and fix the salary for each one of them, because they would simply, in that event, be distributing the appropriation or segregating it among the personnel employed in the public service in the Executive Departments.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Chair will permit me, just a minute. If there ever was a thing that is res adjudicata this is one. Now, I want to call the attention of the Chair to the RECORD of March 23, page 4292, and I read from the RECORD:

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, one word further with regard to this statute. The Chair will observe that this statute was enacted away back in 1850. I presume at that time there were no chiefs of divisions. At least we did not have the same organization that we have now in the Departments.

We did not have the same designation of employees, except the special classes were from 1 to 4, inclusive, and the laborers and messengers that we have always had. Now, the term "other employees" includes all employees that are necessary by reason of the growth of the service. Although not specifically designated or provided for, they are included in the general term "other employees."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I would simply like to add that at that time chiefs of divisions were not known specifically to the law, and consequently they must be included in the words "other employees."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be inclined to give very great weight to the arguments that have been advanced were it not for the fact that the question has apparently been clearly ruled upon in the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress. The question raised was under this same section 169 of the Revised Statutes, and the ruling seems to have been that in the use of the phrase "clerks and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, laborers, and other employees" the term "other employees" was used at the end of a diminishing scale and would not authorize any employee above the grade of clerk of the fourth class.

That is exactly the point now, and I point the Chair to the ruling of the Chair on March 23, in the language which I read.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands it, the gentleman from Illinois invokes against this paragraph the provision of the second clause of Rule XXI of this House that—

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

In opposition to the point of order it is urged that section 169 of the Revised Statutes applies. That section reads as follows:

Each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such numbers of clerks of the several classes recognized by law and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

It does not seem to the Chair that the fact stated that a year or two after the passage of that statute a general appropriation bill was passed appropriating a lump sum for one of the Departments would call for such a construction of section 169 as has been suggested, for section 169 itself distinctly says that the employees shall receive "such rates of compensation as may be appropriated for by Congress," not leaving it to the heads of Departments to determine. Now, it is suggested that the subtreasury at Cincinnati is, by reason of a provision in an act of 1846, which has been cited, a part of an Executive Department of the United States, namely, the Treasury Department, within the meaning of section 169.

The Chair does not find it necessary to pass upon that point at this time, for a reason which will be stated. The highest grade specifically mentioned in section 169 of the Revised Statutes is clerk of the fourth class, and the salary is fixed in the same statute. If the effect to be given to the term "other employees" were entirely an open question, the present occupant of the chair would be inclined to give much weight to the argument of the gentleman from Minnesota, but this precise question is found to have been decided in the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress and the term held to apply only to employees below the grade, at least not above the grade, of clerks as classified in the act of which section 169 forms part.

The Chair, while recognizing the susceptibility of that construction to argument on either side, feels bound by the ruling then made and acquiesced in.

The Chair does not find it necessary to decide at this time whether or not the subtreasury at Cincinnati is a department or to be treated as part of the Treasury Department within the meaning of section 169, for it appears that in section 3612 of the Revised Statutes the salary of the cashier is specifically fixed at $2,000 a year.

The paragraph complained of appropriates $2,250, an increase of $250 above the salary provided by law for that officer. Some other items have been specified as also in violation of the rule. It is not necessary to pass upon them. Ordinarily a bill is read in the House by sections, but the custom has arisen—growing largely out of convenience—of reading appropriation bills in Committee of the Whole by paragraphs. It is a very old custom, founded almost upon necessity, certainly upon strong reasons of convenience, as may be seen from the fact that the first section of this bill covers 161 pages and embraces hundreds of paragraphs. This consideration of the bill by paragraphs, if not directly authorized, is clearly recognized in clause 6 of Rule XXIII.

It has often been ruled that if a point of order be made against an amendment and part of it found out of order the whole amendment must be ruled out. In one or two instances it has been similarly ruled that if a paragraph in a pending bill be objected to and part of it found subject to the point, the whole paragraph falls, and, it seems to the present occupant of the chair, with good reason. If one item is clearly shown to be in violation of the rule, it can hardly be in the province of the Chair to go through and scrutinize the entire paragraph and see what items, if any, are entitled to stay in the bill. If there are such, it would be in order to put them in again by amendment, without the obnoxious matter. Of course, where a point of order is limited to a specific item in a paragraph that item only is affected by the ruling. But this point is aimed at the whole paragraph. Finding that it contains at least one item in violation of the rule, the Chair feels constrained, for the reasons stated, to sustain the point of order against the entire paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of assistant treasurer at New Orleans: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; chief clerk and cashier, $2,250; receiving teller, and paying teller, at $2,000 each; vault clerk, $1,800; two bookkeepers, at $1,500 each; coin clerk, $1,200; six clerks, at $1,200 each; two clerks, at $1,000 each; porter and messenger, $500; day watchman, $720; night watchman, $720; typewriter and stenographer, $1,000; in all, $28,890.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HARDWICK. I rise to make a point of order against the entire paragraph. It has one additional teller, at $2,000, in line 22, on page 63, not authorized by existing law. Then there is a vault clerk, at $1,800, not authorized by law; a coin clerk, at $1,200, not authorized by law; six clerks, at $1,000 each, none of whom are authorized by law.

Mr. LITTAUER. Is there any change in the current law made from the former appropriation?

Mr. HARDWICK. No, sir; but from the statute law.

Mr. LITTAUER. You are making the point of order on that?

Mr. HARDWICK. The point of order is that all of those appropriations are increases in force over the force provided by section 3639 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. When was that statute enacted?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not know; about 1873.

Mr. TAWNEY. About 1873; and the increased service since that time has been taken care of by increasing the clerks from time to time, and those increases are taken care in the present law.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I simply wanted the House to know.

Mr. HARDWICK. I stated it; the gentleman can not state it any plainer than I have stated it to save his life.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from New York to concede the fact?

Mr. LITTAUER. We concede nothing, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman what statute he referred to, as the Chair was unable to hear the gentleman.

Mr. HARDWICK. Section 3609 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, page 712.

The CHAIRMAN. It may well be that the great increase of business since the time when this statute was enacted has necessitated the use and employment there of a larger number of clerks and officials. Nevertheless, it appearing that there are items in this paragraph not authorized by the statute upon the subject nor, so far as the Chair is informed, by any statute, and there being thus no previous authority for the expenditure as required by Rule XXI, the Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of assistant treasurer at New York: For assistant treasurer, $8,000; deputy assistant treasurer and cashier, $4,200; assistant cashier and chief clerk, $3,600; assistant cashier and vault clerk, $3,200; two chiefs of division, at $3,100 each; chief paying teller, $3,000; two chiefs of division, at $2,700 each; chief of division, $2,600; chief of division, and chief bookkeeper, at $2,400 each; chief of division, and assistant chief of division, at $2,300 each; two assistant chiefs of division, at $2,250 each; two assistant tellers, at $2,200 each; two assistant tellers, and one bookkeeper, at $2,100 each; six assistant tellers, one assistant chief of division, and three bookkeepers, at $2,000 each; nine assistant tellers, and two bookkeepers, at $1,800 each; two assistant tellers, at $1,700 each; four assistant tellers, one bookkeeper, and two clerks, at $1,600 each; six assistant tellers, and two clerks, at $1,500 each; nine assistant tellers, one bookkeeper, and four clerks, at $1,400 each; one assistant teller, and two clerks, at $1,300 each; eight assistant tellers, and three clerks, at $1,200 each; six assistant tellers, at $1,100 each; six assistant tellers, at $1,000 each; one clerk, $900; five assistant tellers, at $900 each; two messengers, at $1,200 each; three messengers, at $900 each; two messengers, at $800 each; two hall men, at $1,000 each; two porters, at $900 each; superintendent of building, $1,800; chief detective, $1,500; assistant detective, $1,200; two engineers, at $1,050 each; assistant engineer, $820; eight watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $295,580.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PRINCE. I desire to make the point of order against the entire paragraph, beginning with line 7, on page 64, and ending with line 24, on page 65, for the reason that in line 11, page 64, there is an assistant cashier and vault clerk, at $3,200, entirely new and unauthorized by law, and that can not by any possibility be regarded as a proper provision under section 169 of the statutes as heretofore quoted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the last item the gentleman read.

Mr. PRINCE. It is poison enough to knock out all of it, and they put it in themselves. Assistant cashier and vault clerk, at $3,200, in line 11, beginning with the word "assistant" and ending in line 12 with the word "dollars"—that one is enough. There are a number of others that could be raised.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman specify the others?

Mr. PRINCE. On page 64, in line 12, "one chief of division, at $3,100." I make the point of order against the entire provision. It is unauthorized by law. Two chiefs of division are provided at $3,100. I make another point of order on line 13, "chief paying teller, $3,000;" another point of order, on line 14, beginning with the words "two chiefs of division, at $2,700 each;" line 15, another point of order, "chief of division, $2,600;" line 16, another point of order, "chief of division and chief bookkeeper, at $2,400 each;" and in line 17, "chief of division and assistant chief of division, at $2,300 each;" line 19 again, "two assistant chiefs of division, at $2,250 each;" line 20, "two assistant tellers, at $2,200 each;" further on, "two assistant tellers and one bookkeeper, at $2,100 each;" and I refer the Chairman to section 3603, Revised Statutes, page 711.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois to be that the positions he has named are not authorized at all by section 3603.

Mr. PRINCE. Some are, and some are not. Some are increases; but the one to which I specially call the attention of the Chair, in view of his former ruling, is the one on page 64, line 11, "assistant cashier and vault clerk, $3,200." That is an entirely new office, not authorized by the section of the law, and can not be authorized under section 169, which has been so frequently read. And if, as it has been held heretofore, there is poison enough in the other provisions to put the entire paragraph out, there is poison enough in this one proposition to put the entire paragraph out.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair, then, understand the gentleman's point of order to be based on the single item he has specified?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has made but a hasty examination of section 3603 of the Revised Statutes, to which reference was made, and deems further consideration unnecessary, as it appears that section 3604 immediately following controlles this language:

The assistant treasurer at New York may appoint, from time to time, by and with the consent and approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury, such other clerks, messengers, and watchmen, in addition to those already employed by him, as the exigencies of the public business may require, at rates of compensation to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury; but such rates shall in no case exceed those allowed by law for the several persons similarly employed in the office of the said assistant treasurer.

The Chair is not advised or informed that the salary allowed in this bill in the item complained of is in excess of that allowed other persons similarly employed in the same office, and therefore the appropriation for this clerk being apparently authorized by section 3604, the Chair overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of assistant treasurer at Philadelphia: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier and chief clerk, $2,500; paying teller, $2,300; coin and paying teller, $2,000; bond and authorities clerk, $1,600; vault clerk, $1,600; bookkeeper, $1,800; assorting teller, $1,800; redemption teller, $1,600; receiving teller, $1,700; two clerks, at $1,500 each; three clerks, at $1,400 each; clerk, $1,300; six clerks, at $1,200 each; superintendent messenger and chief watchman, $1,100; six counters, at $900 each; seven watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $48,940.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the entire paragraph, and I specify as new, the paying teller, line 4, at $2,500. Second, the bond and authorization clerk at $1,600, in lines 5 and 6. Then there is an increase over the salary fixed by statute of the receiving teller, $1,700, in line 10. I say that all of these provisions are not authorized by section 3605 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and therefore in violation of Rule XXI, and that the entire paragraph is subject to the point of order under the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Without investigating further, it seems that the paragraph objected to contains an appropriation of salary or compensation for the receiving teller in excess of that authorized by section 3605 of the Revised Statutes. There seems to be no such general provision with reference to the assistant treasurer at Philadelphia as we find relating to the assistant treasurer at New York.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that the assistant treasurer at Philadelphia is specifically provided for in the act of 1846, which I cited a few minutes ago, constituting a part of the Treasury of the United States. It is one of the five places outside of the Treasury building here in Washington that the statute of 1846 defines as the Treasury of the United States. If the Chair has read this provision, he will observe that it designates what constitutes the Treasury of the United States; this building down here occupied by the Secretary, the building at Philadelphia, the custom-house in New York, the custom-house in Boston, and the one in New Orleans is constituted by statute the Treasury of the United States. Therefore it is entirely within Rule XXI.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a point upon which the Chair has not felt called upon to pass, as to whether or not it did constitute a Department within the intendment of section 169 of the Revised Statutes. The difficulty is that whether we treat it as a Department or not an act of Congress itself specifically fixes the salary of this particular employee at $1,300, and the paragraph in question appropriates $1,700, or $400 apparently without authority of law; whereas the second clause of Rule XXI expressly declares that no appropriation shall be in order "for any expenditure not previously authorized by law." The Chair is, therefore, compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will ask the Chair this question: If it would be competent, in the judgment of the Chair, for Congress to appropriate a lump sum for the service in this subtreasury, and in that event, would it not be competent for the Secretary of the Treasury to increase this salary from thirteen hundred to seventeen hundred dollars?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a question the Chair would prefer to meet when the occasion arises.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MORRELL. In reference to the subject-matter of this paragraph and the point of order. Might I ask the Chair if the fact of the authorization of this office would not presuppose that there were and carry with it sufficient and the proper kind of employees to carry it on?

The CHAIRMAN. The difficulty is that the act of Congress specifically provides the employees who shall carry on the office of the assistant treasurer at Philadelphia, but what is most important is that this particular office in question has a fixed salary of $1,300; there is no authority of law for an appropriation of a larger amount, and under the rule of this House an appropriation is not in order without previous authority of law for the expenditure.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, may I ask if the law presupposed that the business of this office should always remain at a standstill and never increase, and that no recommendation made even by the Secretary of the Treasury should be considered? In other words, that it simply means that the office has got to stand still on the level that it was originally constituted.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair is in entire sympathy with the purpose of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but unfortunately the Chair can not presuppose anything except what he finds in the statute. The second clause of Rule XXI specially provides that there can be no appropriation without previous authority of law, and the law fixes the salary of this office at $1,300. Hence an appropriation of seventeen hundred violates the rule. The Chair can only pass upon the point of order and the rule and not upon the merits of the proposed appropriation. The paragraph in question appropriates $1,700 and is out of order because there is no authority of law for the $400 difference.

Mr. MORRELL. Then the increase in population, increase of importance, increase in the business, does not cut any ice as far as these provisions are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. Such a proposition would undoubtedly cut ice if a bill were pending for an increase of clerks or increase of salaries, but it does not in the construction of a rule of the House. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of assistant treasurer at St. Louis: For assistant treasurer, $4,000; cashier and chief clerk, $2,500; first teller, $2,000; second teller, $1,800; third teller, $1,600; assorting teller, $1,800; assistant assorting teller, $1,500; coin teller, $1,200; bookkeeper, $1,500; nine clerks, at $1,200 each; three clerks, at $1,000 each; three day watchmen and coin counters, at $900 each; night watchman, $720; two janitors, at $600 each; in all, $36,820.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph. In line 22 a first teller is provided for at a salary of $2,000. His salary is fixed by the statutes of the United States at $1,800. Immediately following that, in the same line, a second teller is provided for at $1,800. That is an entirely new office. Following that a third teller, in line 23, is provided for at $1,600, also a new office not authorized by the statute, and I refer the Chair on this proposition to section 3607 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of assistant treasurer at San Francisco: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,500; bookkeeper, $1,800; chief clerk, $2,000; assistant cashier, $2,000; first teller, $2,250; assistant bookkeeper, $1,800; coin teller, and one clerk, at $1,800 each; clerk, $1,500; clerk, $1,400; messenger, $840; four watchmen, at $720 each; and two coin counters, at $900 each; in all, $28,670.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the entire paragraph beginning on page 67 with line 8 and closing with line 21. In line 11 a chief clerk at $2,000 is provided for, which is new legislation; in line 13 a second teller is provided for at $2,250, also new legislation, and in line 16 a clerk at $1,500 is also new. Then also the one following, the clerk at $1,400 is new legislation. Two coin counters at $900 each also. This paragraph is in violation of section 3610, page 712, Title XI, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, second edition, 1878.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] to specify a little more particularly. The Chair has difficulty to find just what the matter is. Does the gentleman contend that there are increases of salary?

Mr. PRINCE. No; they are new and unauthorized. They do not fall under the provisions of section 169. Here is a chief clerk at $2,000. The highest classified clerks are $1,800. An assistant cashier at $2,000, while the highest classified clerk is $1,800. There is also a first teller at $2,250.

The CHAIRMAN. There may be a slight change of name in some of the items of the paragraph of the appropriation bill, so that it is difficult to compare with the statute; but the salaries provided for in section 3610 seem to be higher in some particulars than in the bill itself.

Mr. KAHN. That is true; they are higher.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds in the act of Congress one assistant bookkeeper at $2,000. Is that the same item?

Mr. PRINCE. I don't know. I don't think it is. It might be possible. Let us pass that for a moment. First teller, $2,250, on line 13. I can not find any assistant teller in the section that I have referred to. If they see fit to reduce a bookkeeper's salary they can not reduce his salary and call him a classified clerk when they call him a bookkeeper, and then put in another man and regard him as a bookkeeper.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds that there is a provision here in this paragraph for a clerk at a salary of $2,000, apparently not authorized by the statute. Now, even if this office of assistant treasurer at San Francisco can be construed a department, within the meaning of section 169 of the Revised Statutes, nevertheless as that section has been construed by former occupants of the Chair strictly it does not authorize an appropriation for an employee above the class of clerk provided for in that statute, which was a clerk of the fourth class at $1,800. The Chair is therefor compelled to sustain the point of order against the paragraph. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mint at Denver, Colo.: For superintendent, $4,500; assayer, melter and refiner, and coiner, at $3,000 each; chief clerk, $2,500; weigh clerk, $2,000; cashier, $2,250; assistant assayer, assistant melter and refiner, and assistant coiner, at $2,000 each; bookkeeper, $1,800; abstract clerk, warrant clerk, assistant weigh clerk, and calculating clerk, at $1,600 each; calculating clerk, $1,400; and two clerks, at $1,200 each; in all, $38,250.

Mr. HARDWICK and Mr. JOHNSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. HARDWICK. To make a point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rose to offer an amendment to the paragraph.

Mr. HARDWICK. I make the point of order against the entire paragraph on the ground that the chief clerk, at a salary of $2,500, in lines 21 and 22, is unauthorized by law; that the weigh clerk, at a salary of $2,000, is unauthorized by law; that the cashier, at $2,250 is unauthorized by law; that the bookkeeper, at $1,800, is unauthorized by law.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on that point of order, and suggest that the gentleman is quoting the wrong statute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the statute applying to officers at the Denver mint is a special statute. The executive force was provided for as a general provision in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act of 1904. The gentleman is in error in thinking that a portion, at least, of the clerks to whom he has made objection are open to any point of order. I have before me the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for 1904 in which the provision is made, in general terms, that as soon as this mint becomes a coinage mint thereafter it shall be discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint the executive force therein mentioned, and that modifies the coinage act of 1873, from which the gentleman read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad if the gentleman will send to the Chair the statute to which he referred.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I admit there are two clerks there who are not specified in that act, but they are not the ones which the gentleman mentioned.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just this, if the Chair will pardon me: No matter what the legislative act of 1904 is, it was in violation of the statutes of the United States. That is the point we make, and the fact that it was contained in a provision of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill would not meet the point we are now urging against it.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. But that statute is general in terms; it does not apply to any specific year; it simply authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint those people.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion the provision found in the act of March 18, 1904, does authorize the appointment of the force therein specified and at the salaries therein named, but understands it to be conceded that the paragraph in question does contain one item——

Mr. PRINCE. Two, he said.

The CHAIRMAN. Not found in the act of 1904. Is that correct?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I have not compared them, but there is one; the weigh clerk is carried at a different salary than was provided in the act of 1904. But I want to call the Chair's attention to and submit what is known as the "Blount ruling," for the consideration of the Chair. I think that because under the legislative bill of last year the same force was mentioned and provided for which is provided for in the bill for this year, therefore under what is known as the "Blount ruling" that provision becomes existing law in this case. I would like to submit that executive bill also for the consideration of the Chair. The Chair will understand, I think, that these officers who are objected to are those of the executive officers who are not covered by the act of 1904.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman from Colorado yield to a question?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. Looking at the legislative bill, on page 68, line 20, you claim that the "chief clerk, $2,500," is not new?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I did not say that. I said a weigh clerk.

Mr. PRINCE. What do you say as to the other clerks?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I said I had not compared this section of the pending bill with the section of the law of 1904, but I said I admitted that there was one and possibly others against whom this point would lie, but not those that the gentleman from Georgia mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Illinois has concluded his remarks.

Mr. PRINCE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the officers, clerks, etc., in the mint at Denver, are fixed in the act of March 18, 1904; that was an appropriation bill, but nevertheless did more than appropriate for that year. It contained matters of permanent legislation and made continuing provision for this mint—appropriations would be in order upon this pending bill for any salary for any position authorized by the said act of 1904. It provides for a weigh clerk at $1,600. It provides for the position and fixes the salary. But in the paragraph to which objection is made the weigh clerk is allowed $2,000, or $400 more than the act of 1904 authorized. The attention of the Chair has been called to a ruling first made in the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, reported on page 355 of the Manual, thus:

In the absence of a general law fixing a salary, the amount appropriated in the last appropriation bill has been held to be the legal salary, although in violation of the general rule that an appropriation bill makes law only for the year.

But the difficulty in applying that rule here is that the general law does fix the salary at $1,600, and as the paragraph appropriates more than that amount without authority of law, the Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. But as I understand—and I ask the gentleman from Georgia if I am not right—that the objection was not to the whole paragraph, but to particular obnoxious items.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will make objection only to the particular things I have specified, if the gentleman prefers it that way.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Georgia now to limit the point to the item referred to?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains, then, the point of order against the item of "weigh clerk, at $1,600."

Mr. LITTAUER. Do I understand, then, that the other items in this paragraph remain in?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the point of order was limited to the appropriation for one weighing clerk.

Mr. LITTAUER. I think the ruling some time ago was that where one item was out of order that carried out the whole of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That has been the ruling, provided that the point of order is directed to the whole paragraph. It has frequently been ruled it may be limited to one item. In this instance the point was not urged against the paragraph, but was limited to a single item in the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

For wages of workmen and adjusters, and not exceeding $10,000 for other clerks and employees, $75,000.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I submit the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 7 and 8, page 69, strike out the word "seventy-five" and insert "one hundred and fifty" in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to be heard before action is taken on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I wish to speak to the amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. Pending consideration of this matter, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I would like to know the parliamentary status of this amendment. I understand that the amendment is the first thing in order in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be considered as pending when the consideration of the bill is resumed, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Colorado.

The motion was then agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 14467. An act for the relief of Maj. George E. Pickett, paymaster, United States Army;

H. R. 4463. An act to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;"

H. R. 13842. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate The Eastern Star Home for the District of Columbia," approved March 10, 1902;

H. R. 125. An act regulating the retent on contracts with the District of Columbia;

H. R. 4470. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895; and

H. R. 14813. An act to amend an act approved March 1, 1905, entitled "An act to amend section 4 of an act entitled 'An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia,' approved February 28, 1901."

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 290. An act to amend the act approved March 15, 1878, entitled "An act for the relief of William A. Hammond, late Surgeon-General of the Army"—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1697. An act confirming to certain claimants thereto portions of lands known as Fort Clinch Reservation, in the State of Florida—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

S. 4623. An act for the relief of Sarah E. Baxter, executrix of the last will and testament of Warren S. Baxter—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

S. 4925. An act to amend the act approved March 6, 1886, relating to the anchorage and movement of vessels in St. Marys River—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 5026. An act providing for the establishment of a life-saving station at or near Neah Bay, in connection therewith, for life-saving purposes in the vicinity of the North Pacific coast of the United States, etc.—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 5203. An act granting to the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, of Montana, a right of way through the Fort Keogh Military Reservation, in Montana, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 4976. An act to grant certain land to the State of Minnesota to be used as a site for the construction of a sanitarium for the treatment of consumptives—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 1668. An act for the relief of the administrator of the estate of Gotlob Groezinger—to the Committee on Claims.

COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee assignment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee on Pensions—Mr. SAMUEL, of Pennsylvania.

DAM NEAR BERRIEN SPRINGS, MICH.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16671) permitting the building of a dam across the St. Joseph River near the village of Berrien Springs, Berrien County, Mich.

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Berrien Springs Power and Electric Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Michigan, its successors and assigns, to construct, erect, and maintain a dam across the St. Joseph River, in Berrien County, in the State of Michigan, at any point within 2 miles south of the highway bridge at Berrien Springs, together with all necessary works appurtenant thereto: Provided, That the plans of said dam shall be submitted to and be approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War before construction is commenced; and the Secretary of War may at any time require and enforce, at the expense of the owners, such modifications in the construction of said dam as he may deem advisable in the interests of navigation: Provided further, That there shall be placed and maintained in connection with said dam a sluiceway so arranged as to permit logs, timber, and lumber to pass around, through, or over said dam without unreasonable delay or hindrance and without toll or charges; and suitable fishways to be approved by the United States Fish Commission, shall be constructed and maintained on said dam.

SEC. 2. That before the construction of said dam shall be begun, the permission of the board of supervisors of Berrien County, Mich., shall be obtained thereto, and compensation shall be made for all property taken or damages thereby occasioned according to the laws of the State of Michigan.

SEC. 3. That this act shall be null and void unless the dam herein authorized is commenced within two years and completed within five years from the date hereof.

SEC. 4. That the right to amend or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

On page 2, at the end of line 6, insert the following: "and suitable gates, weirs, and sluices shall be provided in said dam, and shall be so operated as to furnish at all times the flow of water necessary for the navigation of the St. Joseph River below Berrien Springs."

On page 2, in line 16, strike out the word "two" and insert the word "one;" strike letter "s" from word "years."

On page 2, in line 17, strike out the word "five" and insert the word "three."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if this river is practically navigable?

Mr. HAMILTON. No.

Mr. PAYNE. Has it ever been navigated?

Mr. HAMILTON. This dam is above the point of navigation. There are already seven dams across the river above the point of navigation.

Mr. PAYNE. It is above the point of navigation? Has the Government any improvements there?

Mr. HAMILTON. No; there are no Government improvements; and this bill has twice been recommended by the War Department.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. LITTAUER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for second secretary of the embassy to Brazil—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of War submitting a recommendation for relief of Col. George S. Grimes, United States Army—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the secretary of Porto Rico, transmitting a joint resolution of the legislative assembly praying for protection to the coffee of Porto Rico—to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

KANAWHA AND HOCKING COAL AND COKE COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Concurrent or other resolutions are in order.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, this is not a resolution; it is simply in the nature of a memorial. I was not in when that order of business was called. If no other Senator wants to introduce something, I will send it forward.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the memorial will be received.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that it be read.

There being no objection, the paper was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

During the year 1901 the Kanawha and Hocking Coal and Coke Company, the corporate name of which is now the Sunday Creek Coal Company, was organized by the officers and stockholders of the Kanawha and Michigan Railroad, Toledo and Ohio Central Railroad, and Hocking Valley Railroad, and financed and floated by the banking house of J. P. Morgan & Co.

This coal company purchased most of the important coal mines on the Kanawha and Michigan Railroad in West Virginia, and then refused for a period of about three years, to allow any new company or owner of coal land on its line to develop any property or ship any coal, stating through their attorneys in open court and through their officers at different times, that they did not intend to allow any new coal mines opened on their line. To curtail the shipment of rail coal in competition with them, they went so far as to tear up the tracks at Plymouth mine, West Virginia, 18 miles below Charleston and at the mines of the Black Diamond Coal Company, about 12 miles above Charleston, so that these companies could not ship coal by rail at all; and they have, up to the present time, refused to put the tracks in again.

The Kelleys Creek Colliery Company, developing a plant about 18 miles above Charleston, and the Hughes Creek Coal Company, developing a plant about 21 miles above Charleston, were refused any kind of side tracks or facilities for shipping coal until after lengthy litigation, and then only after these companies had been put to very extraordinary expense by being required to purchase a number of standard-gauge railroad cars. The Burning Springs Coal Company were treated in like manner, and Johnson Brothers, of Columbus, Ohio, were treated likewise, having been refused side tracks at their mine for something over a year after they were ready to ship coal, and did not get the track until at the end of protracted and expensive litigation.

The M. A. Hanna Coal Company, of Boomer, W. Va., on the Kanawha and Michigan Railroad, found it necessary to purchase 500 cars of their own before they could do business with any satisfaction.

One large independent coal concern on the Kanawha and Michigan Railroad offered to furnish that company its fuel coal for less than 75 cents a ton, when it was at the same time paying the Kanawha and Hocking $1.05 per ton, but the officers of the road refused to purchase its fuel coal from any company except its own, Kanawha and Hocking Company; the same gentleman being at the time president of the Kanawha and Michigan Railroad and of the Kanawha and Hocking Coal Company, the same gentleman purchasing agent and the same auditor. All of which shows conclusively that the coal company is absolutely controlled and owned by the railroad, and is being operated with an open intention and avowal of crushing out the independent operators and all competitors.

All of these and other similar facts can be ascertained by summoning the following witnesses:

Thomas Johnson, of Johnson Brothers, Columbus, Ohio; J. B. Lewis, Montgomery, W. Va.; S. H. Montgomery, Montgomery, W. Va.; V. S. Klick, Columbus, Ohio, 898 Factory street; J. W. Moore, Roe, W. Va.; Arthur Robinson, Coalburg, W. Va.; E. J. Hickey Transportation Company, Covington, Va.; George W. Bright, Columbus, Ohio; J. S. Stone, Columbus, Ohio; Charles Willis Ward, Queens, Long Island, N. Y.; J. W. Dawson, Charleston, W. Va.; F. M. Staunton, Charleston, W. Va.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following act:

On March 22:

S. 4229. An act to authorize the sale and disposition of surplus or unallotted lands of the diminished Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 16671. An act permitting the building of a dam across the St. Joseph River near the village of Berrien Springs, Berrien County, Mich., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

H. R. 17359. An act making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FREE TRANSPORTATION ON RAILROADS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which will be read.

Th Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. TILLMAN, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate all information in the possession of the Commission showing that any railroad companies of the country engaged in interstate commerce are in the habit of receiving payments for the transportation of passengers not in cash paid for tickets but in services rendered under some form of prior agreement between the railroads and the individuals or corporations using the transportation, and particularly all information showing that a custom has existed or now exists on the part of the railroad companies of entering into advertising contracts with the proprietors of newspapers and other publications under which free passes or passage tickets or mileage books are furnished to such proprietors and charged to their account, to be paid for by publishing for the railroads their time-tables, notices of excursions, descriptions of scenery and other miscellaneous reading matter, which publishing is charged to the account of the railroads, so that a system of running accounts to be adjusted at convenience is established between the railroads and the proprietors of the newspapers and other publications; and further to inform the Senate to what extent such customs of not collecting payments for passenger fares in money and of keeping running accounts has prevailed or now prevails between the railroads and the proprietors of newspapers and other publications, and whether such customs are contrary to the interstate-commerce law, and whether any proceedings have been at any time taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission in respect to such customs; and also to transmit to the Senate the reports and opinions of the Commission in any cases concerning such customs which have been heretofore examined and considered or are still pending and undecided in whole or in part, together with the reasons for any delay that has taken place in any such cases and the reasons for any failures on the part of the Commission to investigate and deal with any illegalities in connection with passenger transportation which may have come to the knowledge of the Commission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved

February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Yesterday I gave notice that I would ask leave to call up the conference report on House bill 5976 at the close of the morning business to-day. Out of deference to the desire of the Senator from Pennsylvania to proceed, I will now give notice that at the conclusion of his remarks I shall call up the conference report.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the necessity for a detailed consideration of many of the serious and important legal propositions upon which the bill under consideration rests has been obviated by the lucid and masterful presentation of the views of Senators who have preceded me in this debate. I shall endeavor, therefore, in what I have to say, to avoid repetition of what has been so ably discussed, except so far as bare allusion to some of the great questions is necessary in the substructure of the theory I entertain as to the policy and constitutionality of the great measure we are now considering. I agree with the Senators who have contended, first, that the power to fix railroad tolls for transportation is a legislative power, and that when the legislature has laid down a rule for the establishment of rates the application of such rule to specific cases is a matter of administration which may be delegated to a commission; and, second, that the power to investigate the reasonableness of a proposed rate, and to fix a rate for future observance, is a nonjudicial power which can not be conferred upon courts exercising the judicial power of the United States.

The authorities cited by Senators fully sustain these propositions. Their soundness is essential to the validity of the proposed legislation, and the present question is whether the reported bill in its essential features is securely predicated upon these principles, is otherwise innocuous when submitted to constitutional tests, and whether it properly supplements the existing laws.

Upon the threshold of this inquiry I think it will be instructive to take a general view of the purposes of the law which created the Interstate Commerce Commission and the powers and duties the Commission now possesses and performs.

In the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, etc., Rwy. Co. (167 U. S., 506) the court said:

> The Interstate Commerce Commission is charged with the duty of seeing that there is no discrimination between individual shippers, and that nothing is done by rebate or any other device to give preference to one as against another; that no undue preferences are given to one place or places or individual or class of individuals, but that in all things that equality of right, which is the great purpose of the interstate-commerce act, shall be secured to all shippers.

To these ends the Commission now has, inter alia, the following powers:

First. The power to investigate matters complained of in such a manner and by such means as it shall deem proper.

> The Commission is to keep itself thoroughly informed as to all the operations of every common carrier in the United States engaged in interstate commerce; and whenever in the course of its investigations it discovers abuses which affect the public commercial interests injuriously, its duty is at once to have such abuses suppressed, and, if need be, to call in the strong arm of the Government, through its appointed courts, to enforce the provisions of the law. (United States v. Missouri Pacific Railway Co., 65 F. R., 909.)

Second. The power to require by subpœna the attendance and testimony of witnesses from any place in the United States, and the production of all books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation, and in case of disobedience of the subpœna, to invoke the aid of the United States courts.

This power is conferred in section 12 of the act as amended (25 Stat., 859), and includes the affirmed constitutionality of the law requiring the participant in a criminal transaction to testify in regard thereto, such enforced testimony having the effect, however, of giving the witness complete immunity. (Sec. 12 as amended, 26 Stat., 743; and act of Feb. 11, 1893, 27 Stat., 443.)

Third. The power to inquire into the management of the business of all common carriers subject to the provisions of the interstate-commerce act, to keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the same is being conducted, and to obtain from the carriers full and complete information to enable it, the Commission, to perform its duties. (Sec. 12 as amended, 25 Stat., 858.)

Fourth. The power to prescribe the measure of publicity to be given to joint rates, fares, and charges, to make public proposed advances or reductions in joint rates, fares, and charges, and to determine and prescribe the form of schedules as to rates, etc., to be kept open for public inspection. (Sec. 6 as amended, 25 Stat., 856, 857.)

Fifth. To require annual reports from carriers, to fix the time and prescribe the manner in which such report shall be made, and to require specific answers to all questions upon which the Commission may need information. (Sec. 20, 24 Stat., 386.) This section also authorizes the Commission to prescribe a uniform system of keeping accounts, to be observed by the carriers.

Sixth. To conduct its proceedings in such manner as will best conduce to the proper dispatch of business, and to make or amend such general rules or orders as may be requisite in proceedings before the Commission. (Sec. 17 as amended, 25 Stat., 861.)

Seventh. To direct common carriers to cease and desist from violations of the interstate-commerce law and to make reparation for the injury found to have been done. (Sec. 15, 24 Stat., 384.)

Eighth. To apply to the circuit court in a summary way for an enforcement of its orders (sec. 16 as amended, 25 Stat., 856); and the Commission is directed to execute and enforce the provisions of the act (sec. 12 as amended, 25 Stat., 858), not, however, by attempting to enforce its own decrees and orders, but by calling upon the district attorneys for their enforcement. (United States v. Mo. Pac. Rwy. Co., 65 F. R., 909).

The powers, Mr. President, which I have enumerated I have expressed either in the language of the statutes or in the language of the Supreme Court construing the statutes.

Very broadly speaking, Mr. President, it will be observed from this rough review of its powers that the Commission possesses abundant power to seek and discover deviations from the great purpose of the act to secure equality of right for all, but it wholly lacks power to enforce its orders and decrees, and that its orders and decrees do not have the force of law until made so by judicial decree.

The President in his annual message to the third session of the Fifty-eighth Congress called attention of the Congress to the advisability of expanding the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and again in his message to the present Congress, in these words:

> It is not my province to indicate the exact terms of the law which should be enacted; but I call the attention of the Congress to certain existing conditions with which it is desirable to deal. In my judgment the most important provision which such law should contain is that conferring upon some competent administrative body the power to decide, upon the case being brought before it, whether a given rate prescribed by a railroad is reasonable and just, and if it is found to be unreasonable and unjust, then, after full investigation of the complaint, to prescribe the limit of rate beyond which it shall not be lawful to go—the maximum reasonable rate, as it is commonly called—this decision to go into effect within a reasonable time and to obtain from thence onward, subject to review by the courts.

This suggestion was no surprise to me, as I regarded it the next logical step to be taken in the development of the executive and legislative policy which had been already manifested in proceedings to enforce existing laws and the new legislation of the Fifty-seventh Congress regulating commerce among the States.

This Executive recommendation made it incumbent upon every Member of Congress to give such attention to the subject as would enable him to intelligently determine whether his judgment approved the suggestion of increased power to the Commission, and, if so, the extent to which it should be conferred and how, if at all, its exercise should be supervised.

After giving the subject serious consideration I ventured to publicly express the opinion that the proposition that the National Government should exercise supervisory control over the tax upon transportation became almost self-evident from the time that the railroads began, through various devices, to concentrate this taxing power in the hands of a few men; that the Government's efforts to check this concentration of power under the provisions of existing laws should be supplemented by legislation which will prevent the abuse of the power of taxing the movement of persons and property under any form of concentration or under any circumstances whatever, and that a short and simple law would reach the root of the trouble. That it should provide that the tolls collected by common carriers and the practices pursued by them should be just, fair, and reasonable.

That the Commission should have the power, if it finds the complaint well founded, to declare what shall be a just, fair, remunerative, and reasonable rate or practice to be charged or followed in place of the one declared to be unreasonable.

That this order of the Commission should take effect within such reasonable time as shall be prescribed by the Commission in the order, and should be final, subject only to attack for unlawfulness in the Federal courts, where it would have to stand or fall upon its merits, and that such an act, with suita-lative provision for the regulation of joint rates and rates upon traffic of international carriers, would go to the full extent of, and no further than, the recommendations made by the President.

Subsequently these tentative suggestions were elaborated in a bill which I introduced, and to the provisions of which I shall refer, as an expression of my views upon the general subject. The bill to which I refer, in my judgment, comprehends and deals with the mischiefs for which we are seeking a remedy more effectually than any measure yet brought to the attention of Congress. It is broader and more comprehensive in its scope because it is as broad and comprehensive as the regulative power of Congress under the Constitution. Its provisions include the class of carriers which it describes, engaged in any commerce to which the regulative power of Congress extends under the Constitution, and to all the facilities and instrumentalities connected therewith to which the regulative power of Congress extends, whether they are owned or provided by the carrier or not. It provides for just, reasonable, and nondiscriminating charges and services in transportation, or in connection therewith, from the instant of time that goods are separated from the body of the property of the State from which they are to be transported and pass the line which marks the beginning of Congressional authority, and covers as well the receiving, delivering, storage, or handling of goods before actual transit begins, the transit itself and all charges and expenses and practices relating to or incident to the delivery of such goods in the State to which they are consigned, up until the instant of time when they pass out of the regulative power of Congress into the body of the property of the State where they are delivered and are no longer subject to national control.

The theory upon which this bill was drawn is that general words in a statute which are sufficiently comprehensive to cover the evil aimed at, in whatever form it may possibly appear, makes better and more effective legislation than specific prohibition of the evil in the forms in which it has appeared. The recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad coal cases construing the general words of prohibition against discrimination in the Elkins Act, and the decision in the Northern Securities case construing the general words of prohibition in the Sherman Act, confirm the wisdom of this method of legislation.

This bill follows the recommendations contained in the President's message and clearly provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have power after full hearing upon complaint to set aside any rate, practice, or regulation found by it to be unjust, unreasonable, or discriminatory, and to substitute in its place one that is just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative, which by the terms of the bill then, upon a date fixed by the Commission, becomes the maximum rate to be charged or the practice to be observed by the carrier. In its provision as to the establishment of through routes where none exist, and the establishment of joint rates when carriers fail to agree upon the same, and as to penalties and appeals, the employment of special agents or examiners with power to administer oaths, there is very little essential difference between its provisions and the provisions of the bill under consideration, and I shall not now stop to point out those differences or to recommend that they are more perfectly and efficiently provided for.

After calling attention to its tenth section, which is designed to control the movement of traffic over railroads operating in part in a foreign country, in order to compel obedience to the orders of the Commission, I shall come at once to the fifth section, which provides for what has been popularly termed a court review, the omission of which in the Hepburn bill constitutes the main feature of difference between the two measures.

It is obvious that a law conferring the tremendous power which it is proposed by all the bills under consideration to confer upon the Commission, to substitute one rate or practice for another, must be drawn upon one of two theories: Upon the theory that the order of the Commission shall be final and not reviewable by the courts or upon the theory that it shall be reviewable by the courts. I have no hesitation in saying, upon the authority of the cases which have already been submitted to the Senate by the distinguished Senators who have participated in this debate, that a bill drawn upon the theory that the orders of the Commission shall be final and unassailable in the courts would be unconstitutional.

In Covington, etc., Turnpike Company v. Sandford (164 U. S., 597) the court said:

It is now settled that corporations are persons within the meaning of the constitutional provision forbidding the deprivation of property without due process of law, as well as a denial of the equal protection of the laws.

And in Chicago, Milwaukee, etc., Railway v. Tompkins (176 U. S., 172) the court said:

When we recall that, as estimated, over ten thousand millions of dollars are invested in railroad property, the proposition that such a vast amount of property is beyond the protecting clauses of the Constitution, that the owners may be deprived of it by the arbitrary enactment of any legislature, State, or nation, without any right of appeal to the courts, is one which can not for a moment be tolerated.

In Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company v. Minnesota (134 U. S., 458) the court said:

If the company is deprived of charging reasonable rates for the use of its property, and such deprivation takes place in the absence of an investigation by judicial machinery, it is deprived of the lawful use of its property, and thus, in substance and effect of the property itself, without due process of law and in violation of the Constitution of the United States; and in so far as it is thus deprived, while other persons are permitted to receive reasonable profits upon their invested capital, the company is deprived of the equal protection of the laws.

The question of the reasonableness of a rate of charge for transportation by a railroad company, involving as it does the element of reasonableness both as regards the company and as regards the public, is eminently a question for judicial investigation, requiring due process of law for its determination.

From the decisions of the Supreme Court it will be seen that railroads have a constitutional right to just compensation for services rendered, and that by direct act of legislation, or indirectly through an administrative body, as through the Interstate Commerce Commission, they can not be deprived of this right. That they are entitled to their day in court, and that an act which prevents a judicial review or determination of the question of the reasonableness of an order of the Commission would deprive the carriers of this constitutional right, and would, therefore, be unconstitutional.

Being thus convinced of the unconstitutionality of a law designed to make the orders of the Commission final and not subject to court review, it seemed to me to be proper and rational, if not essential, that the act should provide for that review and throw about it such constitutional restrictions and terms as would prevent unnecessary and frivolous appeals to the courts to defeat the end of this remedial legislation, and this I undertook to do in the fifth section of the bill. That section provides that the orders of the Commission, except orders for the payment of money, which for obvious reasons must be excluded, shall take effect at a date to be fixed by the Commission, and shall continue in effect for a period of time fixed by the Commission, not exceeding two years, unless the Commission itself shall set them aside or they shall be set aside by a court in a suit to test their lawfulness. The method of testing their lawfulness is then prescribed. The right is given to any party to the proceedings, whether it be a municipality, an agricultural association, a mercantile association, a shipper, a carrier, or the owner of some instrumentality necessary or incident to the transportation, who is affected by the decision of the Commission as to the rate and practice covered by the complaint, or by its order prescribing a different rate or practice, and alleging either or both to be in violation of its or his rights, to institute a suit in equity in the circuit court of the United States to have such questions determined.

I desire to draw special attention to the fact that the question that can be submitted to the determination of the court is solely the question as to whether the order violates the rights of the party who institutes the proceedings. There is no attempt to define what those rights are. There is no attempt to expand or to contract them. It is the heritage of every English-speaking man, or association of men, to have his rights determined in a court. It is for the court to decide what those rights are. An attempt to specify what right shall be determined by the court might be fatal to the constitutionality of the legislation. If the specification should not include all his rights, he would be shorn of a constitutional privilege. Should it undertake to enumerate rights which he could not establish, it would be meaningless and unintelligent legislation.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to ask the Senator a question, if it will not interrupt him.

Mr. KNOX. I would rather proceed with my remarks if the Senator will be kind enough to defer his question until later on.

Mr. DANIEL. Very well.

Mr. KNOX. If his rights are determined solely by the Constitution, that instrument would be the measure employed in their determination. If he has rights vested upon some other foundation, a limitation placed upon him to have nothing but his constitutional rights determined, would be a fatal objection.

It seems to me to be wise, both as an indication of legislative intention that the orders of the Commission were not to be inconsiderately disturbed, as well as a provision of protection, to the public, to provide against the suspension of the Commission's orders by interlocutory decrees, without requiring a cash deposit or a bond to secure to the parties entitled to repayment, the difference between the Commission's rate and the railroad rate if the Commission's rate were sustained; and to that end the proviso of the fifth section has been inserted, which carries in its terms a direction to the court to regulate the practice of the parties pending the litigation, in order to make these rights of repayment certain and effective. I do not share the oft-expressed opinion that the courts, even in the absence of such a provision, would lightly deal with the orders of the Commission.

The disposition among Federal judges to grant preliminary injunctions without hearing and for trifling reasons is one I have not observed in my experience, and while I accept, of course, as true the statements made by Senators as to their own experience and observation, I think the situation presented to a court in an application to set aside an order of the Commission made under authority of law would be essentially different from the one presented in ordinary litigation between man and man. It must be remembered that the Commission would be exercising a power delegated to it by Congress; that its findings would have the prima facie force of an act of Congress, not to be suspended, disturbed, or modified, except upon that quantum of proof necessary to overthrow the findings of a master in chancery or the verdict of a jury. I should be amazed, if this power is given to the Commission, to find any circuit court take any view other than the one I have expressed. Section 14 of the act to regulate commerce expressly provides that the Commission's findings shall be deemed prima facie evidence as to each fact found in all judicial proceedings.

While thus far I have done little more than indicate my attitude toward this legislation and a preference for the bill I have introduced as a comprehensive measure, and one most likely to prevent discrimination or preferences between individuals by devices worked out through the accessories to commercial intercourse, and to secure "in all things that equality of right which is the great purpose of the interstate commerce act," and, as well, most likely to escape the construction, so frequently encountered in courts, that the particular evil complained of was not covered by the terms of the law, yet I have referred to it here so much in detail solely with the hope that as a contribution to the general fund it might be of use in adjusting the bill which has been reported to the requirements of the situation.

Up to this time, after having referred to the movement and policy which has logically led to legislation such as is generally proposed in the reported bill, I have undertaken to show in a general way the purposes for which the Interstate Commerce Commission was originally created, the powers which it possesses to effectuate those purposes, and in what direction, in my judgment, those powers should be expanded in order to establish a workable and understandable code of commercial regulation and a type of a bill adapted to the situation. I have contended that a law authorizing the Commission to set aside rates and practices upon complaint, and to substitute others in their stead, must proceed either upon the theory of the Commission's action being final, or upon the theory that it must be subjected to review in the courts. I have, using the bill I introduced as a text, spoken in some detail of its provisions and pointed out that it was drawn upon the constitutional theory of subjecting the orders of the Commission to a court review.

I shall now take up the pending bill and endeavor to ascertain from its provisions whether or not it contemplates such review, and if a review by the courts was contemplated by its proponents, whether they have succeeded in providing for or preventing one, and whether or not to make that bill constitutional such a review is necessary.

I have no words but words of praise for the distinguished Senators who have given their time and great abilities in the work of preparation of this proposed great remedial law. I am in hearty sympathy with the purposes with which they were inspired, but I am sincerely convinced that the bill as it now stands utterly fails to accomplish their beneficent purposes, and, indeed, wholly defeats them.

That the sponsors for this measure conscientiously believed that they had prepared a bill providing unrestricted and unlimited power in the courts, quoting its language in the venue clause, page 17, lines 10 to 14, "to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Commission," is indisputable because of their statements to that effect. Mr. HEPBURN, in closing the debate in the House (RECORD, p. 2651), replying to a question of Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts, stated there was no doubt of the power of the court to review the reasonableness of a rate fixed by the Commission. I quote from the RECORD:

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Then, in your opinion, the court, under this bill, if it becomes law, will have the right to enjoin a rate fixed by the Commission if it is unreasonably low but yet does not amount to confiscation?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think there is no doubt about that.

The junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] is, I understand, in complete accord with Mr. HEPBURN upon this point, and I understand, also, that the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] takes the same position.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. DOLLIVER. If it will not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. KNOX. It will not interrupt me.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I feel impelled to disclaim entertaining that view if it is interpreted as I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania interprets it. The Supreme Court have decided in the Maximum Rate cases that an unfair and unjust rate is an essential deprivation of the carrier's property. I have no doubt they would review the order from that standpoint if the question were presented under the pending bill, but I do not go to the extreme of saying that the court would review the reasonableness of the rate with the view of substituting its discretion for the discretion confided by this bill to the Commission to determine the question whether a disputed rate is just and reasonable.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator from Iowa has stated very much more clearly than I have myself been able so far to state exactly what I understand to be his position.

If this is a correct construction of the bill, it is obvious that, so far as court review is concerned, the only point of difference between these gentlemen and myself is that I stand for a restricted power of the court to set aside the Commission's order while they propose an unrestricted power to that end.

I have ventured the opinion heretofore that I regarded the bill under consideration unconstitutional. I now repeat that opinion, and for the following reasons:

First. It does not provide any method for challenging the unlawfulness of the orders of the Commission in a direct proceeding against the Commission.

Second. It prohibits parties affected and aggrieved by the Commission's orders from defending proceedings to enforce them upon the ground of their unlawfulness.

Third. It so heavily penalizes the disobedience of the Commission's orders as to make any attempt to secure a judicial hearing in any form of proceeding impracticable. These reasons combined manifest such an intention to exclude inquiry into the lawfulness of the acts of the Commission as to bring the measure within the principle decided in the case of the Chicago, etc., Ry. v. Minnesota (134 U. S.), namely, that where the statute deprives the carrier "of its right to a judicial investigation, by due process of law, under the forms and with the machinery provided by the wisdom of successive ages for the investigation judicially of the truth of a matter in controversy it conflicts with the Constitution of the United States."

It is not possible to find in the bill a single word conferring jurisdiction upon any court to entertain a suit of any party aggrieved by any order of the Commission. Although the Commission is given power to sue in several cases, in no case is it made subject to suit. It may sue to enforce its order, but the parties bound by the order can only deny the fact that the order was regularly made.

How can a Commission administering a law of Congress be sued without the consent of Congress? What interest has it in an order after it is made? How can a case or controversy exist between it and a carrier after it has performed its duties under the act? If it is replied that it is the Commission's duty to enforce its orders by proceedings in court, my answer is that it is not a duty under the terms of the bill, but a discretion, and in such proceedings it is but a nominal party. Indeed, it is not necessary for it to be a party at all, as the right to enforce the order is expressly given to the Commission, or any party injured through its disobedience, and the bill expressly provides that the merits of the order can not be tried in such proceedings.

The fact is that under the bill the orders of the Commission can only get into court in two ways. One I have just indicated, in which the carrier can not defend. The other is by a suit by the United States to collect penalties for disobedience of the orders. Both are by proceedings against the carrier. In no way can the order be brought into court by proceedings against the Commission.

It is clearly the purpose of the bill to preclude in proceedings by the United States to collect penalties any consideration by the courts of the validity of the order of the Commission, and indeed it would be a curious consequence if an order made by the Commission could be practically annulled in a proceeding by the United States against the carrier to enforce the penalty to which neither the Commission nor the party who made the complaint was a party. But apart from this consideration, it is evident that a carrier could not afford to take the chances incident to testing the Commission's order in a proceeding to collect these penalties because of the extent to which it would be penalized if its contention should not be sustained by the courts.

The bill confers no right of review whatever upon the initiative of the carrier. It seems to assume the existence of some right in the carrier to institute a proceeding in the courts for the suspension or setting aside of the Commission's order, for in section 16 it is provided that the Commission's order shall take effect thirty days after service of notice thereof upon the carriers affected thereby "unless such orders shall have been suspended or modified by the Commission, or suspended or set aside by the order or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction."

Is it not clear that in the absence of a grant of power to the courts to review the Commission's order in a proceeding brought to have it set aside, the courts, under the peculiar frame of this bill, which imposes no duty upon the Commission or anyone to enforce the order, could not entertain a suit brought for that purpose? Unless and until the Commission should itself move for the enforcement of the order, the carrier by failing to comply therewith would not have a standing in equity to set it aside. And when the Commission does move for the enforcement of the order the bill prohibits a defense upon the ground of its unlawfulness.

The sole ground upon which a claim to relief at the hands of a court of equity could rest would seem to be that the continued existence of the order was a menace to the carrier because of the penalties that might be recoverable for its failure to comply therewith. But how could a court of equity interfere merely to relieve the carrier from an action to recover penalties or to prohibit the United States from prosecuting such an action?

The difficulties in the way of any procedure at the instance of the carrier, intended to get rid of the effect of any order of the Commission (unless such procedure is specially authorized), will be apparent when we consider what relief the courts could afford, supposing that some ground for equitable relief could be found.

A proceeding to restrain the Commission from proceeding to enforce compliance with its order would be of no avail, if the Commission should answer that it did not propose so to proceed.

A proceeding to restrain the United States from bringing an action to recover the penalties could not be sustained.

Nor could a proceeding be sustained the only purpose of which was to secure a declaration upon the part of the court that the Commission had reached a wrong conclusion, and that consequently its order was an unlawful one. There could not be coupled with any such declaration any coercive or effective order which could compel the Commission to annul or modify its order. And if this could not be brought about, resort could not be had to a court of equity merely for the purpose of securing a declaration by it that an order made by an administrative body was unlawful, to be coupled with or followed by no action relieving the carrier from the effects of such order.

In all the cases in which relief has been granted to carriers against orders of commissions some order was possible restraining or enjoining some action upon the part of the commission whose order had been attacked.

In the case of Southern Pacific Company v. Board of Railroad Commissioners (78 Fed. Rep., 236) it was contended upon the part of the board that a certain order it had made reducing rates could not be enjoined, because the board had no further office or duty to perform in respect to the subject-matter of the order. In dealing with this contention Judge (now Justice) McKenna said:

> The grain schedule was served and the twenty days prescribed by statute after which the rates should go into effect had not expired when the bill was filed. Were there yet any acts or duties to be performed by the board? It is very clear that if there was nothing left to be performed—if the rates had become the law to be enforced by other officers than the commissioners—there was nothing to be enjoined in a suit against the commissioners.

And in the case of L. & N. Railroad Co. v. McChord (103 Fed. Rep., 216) the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kentucky enjoined a board of State commissioners from acting under a statute of Kentucky, because in the opinion of the court no opportunity was afforded to any railroad company affected by an order of the commissioners to have the same reviewed by the courts. In this case the circuit court was unable to find any warrant for the contention that after its order had been promulgated the commission had any further duty to perform, and its conclusion as to the effect of this was thus stated:

> It is indeed manifest from the entire scope and plan of the enactment, and its operation upon mere isolated cases only, that it was the purpose to exclude all inquiry upon that subject after the commission had acted, and to enforce by rigorous and extravagant penalties the rates thus fixed, however reasonably and earnestly the railroads might desire to promptly have the question of the justness of those rates finally determined by a judicial inquiry. Upon the principles so often and so emphatically announced by the Supreme Court, this purpose thus plainly written in the legislation must be fatal to its validity.

The Supreme Court set aside the injunction thus granted (McChord v. L. and N. Railroad Company et al., 183 U. S. 483) not because it differed from the circuit court as to the invalidity of the act construed as the circuit court had construed it—on this point no opinion was expressed, but because it held that action on the part of the commissioners was necessary for the enforcement of any order made by them, and consequently that an opportunity would be afforded to initiate proceedings to enjoin such orders.

The result of these considerations—

To quote from the court's opinion—> is that the duty of enforcing its rates rests on the commission, and that none of the consequences alleged to be threatened can be set up as the basis of equity interposition before the rates are fixed at all.

Unless the order itself could be got rid of, how could a mere declaration of a court of equity that it was unlawful be availed of by the carrier in an action brought by the United States to recover penalties claimed to be incurred because of the nonobservance of the Commission's order? The declaration that it was unlawful would have been made in a proceeding to which the United States was not a party, and if for any reason the Attorney-General did not consider that he should be governed thereby, he could have the question of the lawfulness of the Commission's order determined in a proceeding to collect the penalties, in which he could be heard and in which a court of law might, as it certainly could, reach a conclusion in favor of the lawfulness of the Commission's order, in direct opposition to the declaration of a court of equity.

The conclusion seems inevitable that, unless some special method of procedure is provided for in the act which will afford to a carrier the right to have an order of the Commission effectively reviewed and dealt with by the courts, no effective remedy is available.

Unless the courts are empowered, in a proceeding brought with this object in view by the carrier, to suspend, set aside, or modify an order of the Commission, the carrier is practically without remedy, for it can not be otherwise relieved from the coercive effect upon it of the danger that, after all and in the last analysis, the lawfulness of the Commission's order (if this question can be raised at all) will have to be determined in an action brought by the United States to recover the penalties imposed by the act—a danger which, considering the amount that may be recovered, it can not afford to incur.

Even, therefore, if the lawfulness of the Commission's order could be raised in a proceeding brought by the United States to collect these penalties, the remedy thus afforded to the carrier would be utterly inadequate. It would be such a remedy as that adverted to in the opinion of Mr. Justice Brewer in the case of Cotting v. Kansas City Stock Yards Company (183 U. S., 79).

It is doubtless true—

Said Mr. Justice Brewer in that case—> that the State may impose penalties such as will tend to compel obedience to its mandates by all individuals or corporations, and if extreme and cumulative penalties are imposed only after there has been a final determination of the validity of the statute, the question would be very different from that here presented. But when the legislature, in an effort to prevent any inquiry of the validity of a particular statute, so burdens any challenge thereof in the courts that the party affected is necessarily constrained to submit rather than take the chances of the penalties imposed, then it becomes a serious question whether the party is not deprived of the equal protection of the laws.

But, as already pointed out, no inquiry into the lawfulness of the Commission's orders would be possible in actions for the penalties imposed by the bill.

That the bill as it now stands is not only unfair, in respect to the question of review, but is also unconstitutional, seems to be clear. The decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company v. Minnesota (134 U. S., p. 418) would seem to settle this.

In that case the railway commission of Minnesota, acting under a statute of that State, after a hearing upon complaint and answer, found that a certain rate should be thereafter charged, which rate the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, the carrier affected by such order, declined to put in force. Thereupon the commission, following the procedure which the act authorized, applied for a mandamus to compel the railway company to publish the rate which it had prescribed. The railway company set up in its return to the alternative writ that the rate which it had had in force was a reasonable, fair, and just rate and that the rate which it had been directed by the commission to promulgate was not a reasonable or fair or just rate and that the establishment of this rate by the commission amounted to a taking of the railway company's property without due process of law.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in passing upon the questions involved, held, in the first place, that it was concluded by the construction put upon the statute by the supreme court of Minnesota, and that consequently it must assume that it was the intention of the statute (provided the commission proceeded in the manner pointed out therein) to make the rates, which it directed should be enforced, as the Supreme Court put it in its opinion, "not simply advisory, nor merely prima facie equal and reasonable, but final and conclusive as to what are equal and reasonable charges; that the law neither contemplated nor allowed any issue to be made or inquiry to be had as to their equality or reasonableness in fact; that under the statute the rates published by the commission are the only ones that are lawful, and therefore in contemplation of law the only ones that are equal and reasonable, and that in a proceeding for mandamus under the statute there is no fact to traverse except the violation of law in not complying with the recommendations of the commission."

Accepting this as the effect which it was bound to give the statute, the court held that so construed it was in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

This being the construction—

Said Mr. Justice Blatchford, delivering the opinion of the court—of the statute by which we are bound in considering the present case, we are of opinion that, so construed, it conflicts with the Constitution of the United States in the particulars complained of by the railroad company. It deprives the company of its right to a judicial investigation, by due process of law, under the forms and with the machinery provided by the wisdom of successive ages for the investigation judicially of the truth of a matter in controversy, and substitutes therefor, as an absolute finality, the action of a railroad commission which, in view of the powers conceded to it by the State court, can not be regarded as clothed with judicial functions or possessing the machinery of a court of justice.

In the opinion reference is made to the fact that the statute permitted the commission to promulgate a rate in place of one found by it to be unreasonable without having first accorded the carrier an opportunity to be heard; but this fact could have no controlling effect upon the decision, because the commission had, in the case of the rate at issue, promulgated it after hearing the carrier's side of the case.

In the concurring opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Miller it appears very clearly that he was governed in reaching his conclusion by what he regarded as the unlawfulness of the attempt made to deprive the carrier of any review of the commission's order by the courts. This is apparent from the following extract from his opinion:

I do not agree that it was necessary to the validity of the action of the commission that previous notice should have been given to all common carriers interested in the rates to be established, nor to any particular one of them, any more than it would have been necessary, which I think is not, for the legislature to have given such notice if it had established such rates by legislative enactment.

But when the question becomes a judicial one and the validity and justice of these rates are to be established or rejected by the judgment of a court, it is necessary that the railroad corporations interested in the fare to be considered should have notice and have a right to be heard on the question relating to such fare, which I have pointed out is a judicial question. For the refusal of the supreme court of Minnesota to receive evidence on this subject I think the cause ought to be reversed, on the ground that this is a denial of due process of law in a proceeding which takes the property of the company, and if this is a just construction of the statute of Minnesota it is for that reason void.

Mr. President, I ask Senators to make especial note of the fact that this question was raised in a proceeding to enforce the commission's order, and a denial of the right to defend on the merits was held to invalidate the law. The right to defend on the merits in such a case is expressly withheld in the bill we are considering.

While the courts have upheld acts of Congress conferring final power upon administrative officers, they have refused to do so when the orders of such officers affected rights secured or recognized by the Constitution.

Thus in Wong Wing v. United States (163 U. S., 228) the Supreme Court while recognizing its previous decisions as to the conclusive effect of decisions of the officers charged with the duty of enforcing the Chinese exclusion acts, refused to extend the doctrine of these cases to an order of such officer committing one adjudged by him to have been guilty of a violation of the act to prison for a period of sixty days, although such order was authorized by the provisions of the act.

After referring to previous decisions of the court in which it had been determined that the deportation of aliens not entitled to be in the country did not constitute a deprivation of life, liberty, or property, Mr. Justice Shiras, who delivered the opinion of the court, said:

No limits can be put by the courts upon the power of Congress to protect, by summary methods, the country from the advent of aliens whose race or habits render them undesirable as citizens, or to expel such if they have already found their way into our land and unlawfully remain therein. But to declare unlawful residence within the country to be an infamous crime, punishable by deprivation of liberty and property, would be to pass out of the sphere of constitutional legislation, unless provision were made that the fact of guilt should be first established by a judicial trial. It is not consistent with the theory of our Government that the legislature should, after having defined an offense as an infamous crime, find the fact of guilt and adjudge the punishment by one of its own agents.

While the right of Congress to confer upon the Secretary of War final discretion as to approval of bridges over navigable streams has not been successfully challenged, when the question has arisen as to the finality of an order made by him pursuant to authority conferred upon him by Congress, requiring the removal or alteration of bridges upon the ground that they had become an obstruction to navigation, the courts have held that his decisions were subject to judicial review.

See United States v. Bridge Company (45 Fed. Rep., 178); United States v. Rider (50 Fed. Rep., 406).

In United States v. City of Moline (82 Fed. Rep., 592) Judge Grosscup thus dealt with the question of the authority of administrative bodies. He said:

In this case two questions alone arise: First. Is the bridge an obstruction to navigation? Second. Is it there by any such legal right that the Government may not interfere with it in the respect designated without just compensation? The first question is purely administrative, and is one that Congress can certainly delegate to the Secretary of War. A thousand questions of equal moment to the parties interested, and of equal difficulty, are necessarily delegated to the great Departments of the Government every month. In the very nature of things Congress can not dispose of them. A Government of the size of this, operated upon such a conception would be clogged immediately. The second question is, undoubtedly, judicial, and for that very reason is not subject, constitutionally, to the decision of Congress any more than of the Secretary of War. If the bridge be there by legal right—if it be a franchise or property that can not be taken except after just compensation—Congress is powerless, either by special or general acts, to touch it. In the face of such property right Congress is as helpless as the War Department. In the end such right, whether it be attacked by special act of Congress or by action of the War Department, will, through some channel, find an appeal to the judiciary. This right of appeal to the judiciary in all questions in their nature judicial is preserved in the sections of the statute under discussion. The Secretary of War has no power to carry out his decisions respecting these obstructions except through a court. Any question, whether law or fact, essentially judicial, may be raised under these informations. A court of the United States stands always, by the clear provisions of the act, between the decision of the Secretary and its execution. There is, therefore, in the act no delegation of judicial power to the Secretary that is not open to review in the courts. I hold, therefore, that the act, so far as it is applicable to the case in hand, is constitutional and valid, and the motion to quash will be overruled.

The motion to quash, which Judge Grosscup overruled, was made upon the ground that the decision of the Secretary of War that the bridge in question amounted to a nuisance was, under the acts of Congress, a final determination of the matter, and that such decision was not open consequently to question or review in the courts. Because of his conclusion that this was not the case, Judge Grosscup refused to quash the information.

The principle is thus concisely stated in Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Co. (18 Howard, 284):

To avoid misconstruction upon so grave a subject, we think it proper to state that we do not consider Congress can either withdraw from judicial cognizance any matter which, from its nature, is the subject of a suit at the common law, or in equity, or admiralty; nor, on the other hand, can it bring under the judicial power a matter which, from its nature, is not a subject for judicial determination. At the same time there are matters, involving public rights, which may be presented in such form that the judicial power is capable of acting on them, and which are susceptible of judicial determination, but which Congress may or may not bring within the cognizance of the courts of the United States, as it may deem proper.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania a few moments ago to say that the right of the carrier to go into court and defend itself against the action of the Commission is expressly denied by the proposed act.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator misunderstood me, then. I said that the right of the carrier to defend, in a proceeding begun by the Commission to enforce its orders, is expressly denied by the proposed act.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator kindly refer to that provision of the proposed statute?

Mr. KNOX. If the Senator will permit me to finish my remarks, I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. I can indicate where the Senator can lay his hand on it. It is that provision of the statute which gives the Commission, or any person affected by an order of the Commission, the right to go into any circuit court of the United States and by mandamus or otherwise secure the enforcement of the order. But in such proceedings the right of the carrier or other person who is made defendant in the proceedings is limited to the question as to whether or not the order was regularly made, and not as to its lawfulness.

Mr. NEWLANDS. What section is it?

Mr. KNOX. Section 15, I believe.

Whatever the intentions of the framers of this bill may have been, they have succeeded in producing a measure which permits an administrative body to make orders affecting property rights, gives no right to the owners of the property to test their lawfulness in the courts in a direct proceeding, denies the right to challenge their lawfulness in proceedings to enforce them, and penalizes the owner of the property in the sum of $5,000 a day if it seeks a supposed remedy outside of the provisions of the bill for challenging either its constitutionality or the lawfulness of the acts performed under its provisions.

The conclusion to which I am irresistibly led for the reasons and upon the authority I have given is that such a measure is unconstitutional.

Mr. President, as Congress is now dealing for the first time with the proposition to confer upon its Commission the power to examine and readjust rates, it is instructive to observe the manner in which some of the States have dealt with the question of court review, as applied to the acts of their own State railroad commissions exercising similar powers. With the view of ascertaining to what extent such provisions are incorporated in the laws of these States, and also of learning the nature of such provisions, I recently caused to be prepared a statement showing the provisions in their statutes with regard to the review of the orders of State railroad commissions; and believing that this information would prove of value in the determination of the similar question now before this body, I presented the memorandum to the Senate, and it was made a Senate document.

That statement refers to the statutes of 16 States. It is, of course, impracticable for me to refer at length to each of these statutory provisions, but they have been summarized as follows:

In all the right of court review is affirmed, in some more comprehensively granted than in others, but in none wholly ignored. In Alabama the courts may examine into the reasonableness and justice of a commission's order, and appeal may be carried up to the supreme court of the State. The Arkansas statute allows the justice of the railroad tariff to be passed upon judicially. While the Florida law vests the railroad commission with judicial powers, it also provides that appeals "by either party" from judgments, orders, and decrees of inferior courts shall be to the same extent that appeals lie "in similar cases and suits brought under any other law of the State." Indiana provides for an appeal by "a dissatisfied company or party" to its highest tribunal. Kansas has a similar provision, and there, too, the courts may inquire whether the rate prescribed by the commission is "reasonable and just." Parties in interest may carry their case up to the supreme court of Louisiana "without regard to the amount involved."

In Minnesota the right of appeal to the supreme court is elaborately provided for. Mississippi also guards the right, and declares that in trials of cases "brought for a violation of any rate of charges as fixed by the commission, it may be shown in defense that such tariff so fixed was unreasonable and unjust to the carrier." Missouri gives the reviewing court, if it holds and decides that the challenged order of the railroad commission was not lawful, the power and right, "without reference to the regularity or legality of the proceedings of said board or of the order thereof," to proceed "to make such order as the said board should have made." Here is a "court review" with a vengeance! North Carolina allows appeals to be carried to its supreme court. So do North Dakota and South Dakota. Texas also grants to either party dissatisfied with the commission's order the benefit of judicial review practically unrestricted. Virginia, to expedite decision, has enacted that all appeals from the commission "shall lie to the supreme court of appeals only." Washington permits any railroad or express company "affected" by an order of the railroad commission to test its lawfulness in the superior court. In the Wisconsin law it is set forth that dissatisfied parties may bring an action in the circuit court of the State to vacate the order of the commission, which is made the defendant, and the court may pass upon the lawfulness or reasonableness of the commission's requirement.

It will be seen from this outline, and more particularly from the document above referred to, known as Senate Document No. 278 of the present session, that the legislatures of these States have deemed it necessary to incorporate in their statutes specific provisions for review, or to provide for defense against the enforcement of orders which are deemed by the carriers to be unjust or unreasonable.

Now, Mr. President, if such provisions are necessary in the legislation of States possessing complete original sovereign power over the subject, hampered by no limitations except such as are contained in their own constitutions and imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, a fortiori, they are necessary in an act of Congress which rests upon the delegated power of commercial regulation.

I can not but think there is some difference in the plenitude of the respective powers of the State and nation arising not only out of the source of the power but out of the difference of the relations of the two sovereignties to the subject upon which the power operates.

The right of a railroad to establish public highways and to take tolls for the transportation of persons and property is a right derived from the States who delegate to private enterprise a public function. The right of a State to exercise free control over the operations of a railroad and the charges for its service grows out of its dominion over an institution it has created to perform a function of the State.

The right of Congress is found in the constitutional power to regulate commerce among the States, which the great Chief Justice said:

> Is the right to prescribe the rule by which commerce shall be governed.

The purpose of these observations is not to throw doubt upon the power of Congress to confer upon the Commission the powers proposed in this bill—of this I have no doubt—but to confirm the view that in dealing with the subject greater caution should be observed in guarding the rights of those upon whom its provisions are intended to operate, because of the difference in the radical relations of the States and the nation to the subject and to emphasize the suggestion that it would be unwise to omit in national legislation that which seemed necessary in State legislation.

It could be contended, if it were admitted that Congress could not establish a schedule of rates, that Congress could lawfully enact the main proposition of this bill. I do not believe that an act to regulate rates, to secure their reasonableness and uniformity, necessarily depends upon Congressional power to establish rates; it could safely rest upon the power to prescribe a rule to govern rates when established. Congress's power to regulate the construction of a bridge across a navigable stream does not depend upon its power to build the bridge.

Is there not a difference between establishing rates and establishing a rule that they shall be reasonable and nondiscriminatory? The power to regulate commerce includes the power to remove restrictions upon commerce; and unreasonable, extortionate, and discriminating rates and practices amount to a restriction, an obstacle, an obstruction.

The decision in the Northern Securities case is precisely put upon the ground that Congress has power to prescribe the rule of freedom of competition and that the incidental interference with corporations created by a State in the enforcement of the rule does not suggest an attempt to assume control over them for any other purpose. The court said in that case:

> The means employed in respect of the combinations forbidden by the antitrust act, and which Congress deemed germane to the end to be accomplished, was to prescribe as a rule for interstate and international commerce (not for domestic commerce) that it should not be vexed by combinations, conspiracies, or monopolies which restrain commerce by destroying or restricting competition, etc.

Similar provisions for a judicial review, or for judicial investigation of complaints, are also to be found in nearly all of the bills upon the subject of rate regulation that have been introduced during the present session of Congress, to wit:

H. R. 295, introduced by Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama, December 4, 1905, provides (sec. 4) for a review by the circuit court.

H. R. 469, introduced by Mr. HEARST December 4, 1905, provides (secs. 9 and 10) for a court of interstate commerce, which shall have exclusive jurisdiction to review all orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that any party aggrieved may file a petition for review, such review to include the justness, reasonableness, and lawfulness of the order.

H. R. 4425, introduced by Mr. TOWNSEND December 6, 1905, provides (sec. 7) for review by the circuit court.

H. R. 8414, introduced by Mr. SUTZER December 15, 1905, provides for judicial review (p. 2, lines 20 to 25).

H. R. 8999, introduced by Mr. OLCOTT December 18, 1905, provides for a judicial review (p. 3, lines 3 to 10).

H. R. 10998, introduced by Mr. HOGG January 4, 1906, provides for a court of transportation, which shall inquire into and determine complaints presented by a commission termed the transportation commission (p. 8).

H. R. 10639, introduced by Mr. HEPBURN January 4, 1906, provides, on page 15, for the determination by the circuit court of the lawfulness of an order, upon complaint for its enforcement, and on page 16 distinctly recognizes and refers to an assumed right of the carrier "to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Commission."

H. R. 12220, introduced by Mr. MCCALL January 17, 1906, provides (p. 1, lines 11 to 13) for a judicial investigation of complaints made to the Commission and for an appeal in all cases to the Supreme Court (p. 3, lines 2 to 4).

H. R. 12312, introduced by Mr. DAVEY January 18, 1906, provides for a review in the circuit court by any carrier or other party aggrieved (p. 11, lines 19 to 25).

S. 285, introduced by Mr. FORAKER December 6, 1905, provides (p. 3) for a judicial review in the circuit court upon an action for enforcement of an order, and for the right of appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court (p. 4, lines 10 and 11).

S. 2261, introduced by Mr. DOLLIVER December 19, 1905, provides for the judicial determination of the lawfulness of an order, upon an action for its enforcement (p. 15, lines 10-15).

S. 2653, introduced by Mr. CULBERSON January 8, 1906, provides for judicial review where rate prescribed by Commission is confiscatory (p. 2, lines 5 to 10).

S. 4072, introduced by Mr. ELKINS February 13, 1906, provides for judicial review by the circuit court, section 3.

S. 4639, which I introduced February 22, 1906, provides for review, section 5.

Of the remainder, practically all contemplate and refer to, although they do not expressly provide for, a judicial review.

H. R. 278, introduced by Mr. CANDLER December 4, 1905, contemplates and refers to a judicial review (sec. 7).

H. R. 184, introduced by Mr. RUSSELL December 4, 1905, contemplates and refers to a judicial review (sec. 7).

H. R. 5966, introduced by Mr. ADAMSON December 11, 1905, clearly contemplates and refers to a judicial review, but does not expressly provide for one (secs. 4 and 9).

H. R. 11488, introduced by Mr. HEPBURN January 11, 1906, contemplates and refers to, but does not provide for, a judicial review (p. 10, lines 1 to 3, and p. 16, lines 5 to 7).

H. R. 12387, introduced by Mr. HEPBURN February 8, 1906, contemplates and refers to, but does not provide for, a judicial review (p. 14, lines 22 to 25, and p. 17, lines 10 to 13).

I am aware of but one bill (S. 1378, introduced by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]) which grants the Commission the power to fix rates, and which fails to provide expressly either for a judicial review or investigation, or to recognize a power assumed to exist in the Federal courts to review the orders of the Commission; and in that one instance it was stated at the time the bill was introduced that the reason it was not included was because the right of review already existed. What the Senator said was, I quote from the RECORD, page 233:

> Mr. GALLINGER. I want to ask the Senator if I correctly understand his proposition as embraced in the bill to mean that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be given the power to fix rates and that there shall be no appeal to the courts permitted—that it shall be absolute?
> Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, no; the Supreme Court has declared—and the Senator is familiar with the decision—that under the Constitution Congress has no such power, and it is not worth while for us to say in a bill that we are going to give that power, because the court would pay no attention to it and would declare such a bill unconstitutional.

If this is correct; if there exists a practical unanimity in the desires and views of those who have given sufficient thought and study to this matter to be willing to express their views in the form of a bill; if all these Senators and Representatives believe either that a provision for review is essential or desirable, or take the ground that that right already exists in the courts, or that it should be included in the bill, what can possibly be the objection to definitely stating that right in the bill?

One thing I want to settle absolutely and to make clear beyond the possibility of a doubt: There exists in the minds of a large number of people throughout the United States the idea that the pending bill opposes a judicial review, and that those who are attempting to amend the bill by the insertion of a provision for review are endeavoring to force something into the bill that is foreign to its purposes. Such a view is erroneous. I do not mean that the bill effectually provides for a review, but that it makes distinct reference to such review, and assumes that such right exists.

That the bill provides, page 11, lines 5 to 9, as follows:

> Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

And on page 14, lines 20 to 25:

> And the orders of the Commission shall take effect at the end of thirty days after notice thereof to the carriers directed to obey the same, unless such orders shall have been suspended or modified by the Commission or suspended or set aside by the order or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction.

And on page 17, lines 10 to 14:

> The venue of suits brought in any of the circuit courts of the United States to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Commission shall be in the district where the carrier against whom such order or requirement may have been made has its principal operating office.

Now if these expressions "suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction;" "suspended or set aside by the order or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction," and "the venue of suits brought in any circuit court of the United States to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Commission" do not refer to and contemplate a review, what do they mean?

One of two things is certain, either the bill does or it does not provide for a review. If it does not provide for review, and if those in favor of the bill as it now stands do not contemplate or desire a review, then, in all fairness, these provisions should be stricken from the bill.

The fact is, however, as I have already shown, that the friends of the bill as it now stands claim, not that it does not contemplate a review, but that the bill either sufficiently provides for a review, or recognizes a right claimed to exist independently of the bill. On the other hand, while not differing from them in the object sought to be accomplished, I claim that the bill does not effectively provide for a review, and that it is essential in view of its other provisions that such a right should be distinctly given in the bill. But for the seriousness of the situation the matter would be most ludicrous. Both sides agree that the right should exist; one holds that it is in the bill or exists independently; the other that it is not in the bill, but should be; and yet the former, for some mysterious and unaccountable reason, objects to an amendment which would place the matter beyond doubt.

When we consider that the people are asking for prompt, decisive, and effective action; that the present bill distinctly contemplates a review; that its constitutionality is seriously threatened by failure to provide for such review if the other features are to stand; that precedents of State legislation are in favor of a review; that all the bills presented in either House provide for or recognize a review; that this bill itself as presented in both Houses, and as originally prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission, contained a provision for review, and that the President in his message speaks of the orders being subject to review—when we consider all these facts, the action of those who are willing to imperil the validity and effectiveness of this law by not explicitly providing for a review for no valid reason whatever is to me incomprehensible.

It is not my purpose, Mr. President, to discuss at length the proposition involved in the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], which raises the question of the power of Congress to prevent the circuit courts of the United States from exercising what I deem to be an inherent function of a court of equity, namely, the power to grant an injunction, preliminary or final, to suspend an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission in a case where it is alleged and established to the satisfaction of the court that the order takes the property of a carrier or person without allowing just compensation for its use. An extended discussion of this question after the able argument of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] would be superfluous.

I am constrained, however, to say that, in arriving at a correct solution of this question, it is necessary to have constantly in mind the distinction between the judicial power of the United States and the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, as prescribed by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The Constitution prescribes that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish (Art. III, sec. 1); and in the next paragraph

> The judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls.

It will be observed that in the first case the Constitution says where this power shall be vested and in the next to what cases it shall extend, but it in no way attempts to define the power further than to indicate the three well-known branches through which it operates—law, equity, and admiralty. These three divisions or features of judicial power were not created by the Constitution, but were well understood and existed long before the Constitution was thought of. Thus the framers of that instrument merely adopted the system of jurisprudence then in existence and in use among English-speaking people, and presumed that the judicial system of the new nation should be founded upon the same principles of administrative justice.

It is also necessary to bear in mind the fact that the judicial power is one of the three coordinate powers of the Government of the United States, equal and in no material respect subordinate to either of the others. Indeed, in some respects it may be said to be the superior of the others, for it may pass upon the validity of their acts. Congress did not create this power. It exists wholly independently of that body; but while this is true, Congress has an office to perform in connection with it. This office is to create and establish the inferior Federal courts and to distribute or apply the judicial power to them. And right here is the vital part of the controversy. By the creation of these inferior courts Congress does not also create the power with which they are to be clothed. Congress merely applies the power already created by the Constitution. If it were otherwise, and Congress not only created the courts but the judicial power as well, then it would undoubtedly be true that Congress could likewise deprive the courts of this power by taking away one or more of their essential and inherent subordinate powers, such as the right to issue the writ of injunction. But that is not the case. The judicial power exists inherently by virtue of the Constitution, which instrument likewise created Congress and prescribed that it should establish the courts through which the judicial power should operate.

The office of Congress is therefore to distribute and not to create these powers. This power of distribution is a step lower down in the scale than the power to create. The first is the creation of the judicial power itself. That was accomplished by the Constitution. The next step was the distribution of these powers to the Supreme Court and to the dead machinery of the lower courts. And the third and next lower step is the mapping out of the jurisdiction of the court—that is, the prescribing of the particular objects or cases upon which this judicial power shall operate, which latter in very large measure was also outlined in the Constitution.

The judicial power, therefore, and the forms through which it operates, is a very different matter from a creation of the courts through which the power shall operate and the prescribing of the particular cases upon which it shall operate.

It is not necessary to consider the history of the origin and development of the chancery as a court distinct from the common-law courts. It is sufficient to state that the whole framework and structure of equity jurisprudence was built up and made possible because of this inherent equity power, the power of injunction, and now it is suggested to limit and control this power.

If Congress can interfere and lop off this highly essential branch of equity jurisprudence, it is easy to see that it can destroy the whole system or at least its efficacy. Such an attempt upon the part of Congress would clearly be an encroachment upon another and a coordinate branch of the Government, and it is a matter of highest satisfaction to know that in the system of nicely adjusted checks and balances which safeguard this Government the judicial power is not helpless, but may assert its own proper position and functions by declaring such an encroachment unconstitutional. That the Supreme Court would do so can hardly be doubted.

In volume 16, Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure, page 30, occurs the following:

> When, however, equity jurisdiction is confered over a particular subject, such jurisdiction includes with respect to that subject all the powers of courts of chancery.

"All of the powers of courts of chancery," not some of them. All of them. The power of injunction is the most vital of them all. How can a court of equity exercise all of its powers if its most vital power is taken away?

And again in Beach on Modern Equity Jurisprudence, section 5:

> The jurisdiction in equity has in many instances been modified in one way or another by modern statutes; but these statutes have ordinarily dealt with matters of practice or with matters which are not fundamentary; and the changes have not affected the fundamental principles of equity. Legislation affecting such changes is subject to various constitutional limitations. The most important of these is the provision preserving the right to trial by jury, which can not be curtailed by the extension of equity jurisdiction. And, on the other hand, it is said that the right to have equity controversies dealt with by equitable methods is as sacred as the right of trial by jury.

And in Bispham's Equity, sixth edition, page 2:

> In the Federal courts the limits of equitable jurisdiction are to be ascertained by reference to the boundaries within which the powers of the English court of chancery were exercised.

The power of injunction, as we have seen, is the very power to which the English court of chancery is indebted for its existence. Measured by this standard, how can Congress claim the power to take it away?

One of the best statements of the law upon this subject is to be found in Bates on Federal Equity Procedure:

> SEC. 525. These constitutional and statutory provisions have had the effect to vest in the several courts of the United States, in cases over which they have jurisdiction, respectively, full and complete equity power and jurisdiction, as that jurisdiction was known, defined, distinguished, and administered in England at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, embracing, among other powers, the power to grant injunctions, etc.
> SEC. 526. Full and complete chancery jurisdiction is conferred on the courts of the United States, in the classes of cases of which they have cognizance, with the limitation that suits in equity shall not be sustained by them where plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law. The rules of the High Court of Chancery of England have been adopted by the courts of the United States. And there is no other limitation to the exercise of a chancery jurisdiction by these courts in the classes of cases committed to them by the Constitution and laws of the United States. * * * The usages of the High Court of Chancery in England, whenever the jurisdiction is exercised, govern the proceedings. The remedies in equity in the courts of the United States are the same, and are to be granted and administered according to the principles, usages, and remedies in equity in England at the time our Government was established: and where, under the English chancery system, relief by injunction can be given, the same or similar relief may be given by the courts of the United States.

In the Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States, 148 U. S., 325, the Supreme Court quoted with approval the following language taken from the case of Isom v. Mississippi Central Railroad, 36 Miss., 315:

> The right of the legislature of the State, by law, to apply the property of the citizen to the public use, and then to constitute itself the judge in its own case, to determine what is the "just compensation" it ought to pay therefor, or how much benefit it has conferred upon the citizen by thus taking his property without his consent, or to extinguish any part of such "compensation" by prospective conjectural advantage, or in any manner to interfere with the just powers and province of courts and juries in administering right and justice, can not for a moment be admitted or tolerated under our Constitution. If anything can be clear and undeniable, upon principles of natural justice or constitutional law, it seems that this must be so.

Mr. President, a correct solution of the question mooted is to be arrived at only by keeping in mind the fundamental difference between the jurisdiction of a court and the judicial power which operates and extends over the matters of which it has jurisdiction, which power is itself the life of the court. The creator and life giver of the whole judicial system is the Constitution, and not Congress.

Congress maps out the jurisdiction of the court by stating upon and to what particular objects this judicial power shall extend and operate, but here its office ends. All of the decisions cited to support the proposition that Congress may take from a court of equity the power to do equity extend no further than to the jurisdiction of the courts. Of this Congress undoubtedly has complete control, subject to the limitations imposed by the Constitution. What, then, does jurisdiction mean? Nothing more than the right to speak. Congress can clearly say when the judicial power operating through the circuit courts shall speak, but not how it shall speak.

Congress may say through what tribunals the judicial power shall operate, but it can neither limit nor eliminate an essential function of that power when vested. That would be an encroachment by the legislative upon the judicial branch of the Government, an encroachment full of danger to the stability of the Government.

In the case of Brown v. Kalamazoo Circuit Judge (75 Mich., 283, 284) the court said:

> It is within the power of a legislature to change the formalities of legal procedure, but it is not competent to make such changes as to impair the enforcement of rights.
> The functions of judges in equity cases in dealing with them is as well settled a part of the judicial power and as necessary to its administration as the functions of juries in common-law cases. Our constitutions are framed to protect all rights. When they vest judicial power, they do so in accordance with all of its essentials, and when they vest it in any court they vest it as efficient for the protection of rights, and not subject to be distorted or made inadequate. The right to have equity controversies dealt with by equitable methods is as sacred as the right of trial by jury.

I consider the question raised by the junior Senator from Texas an important one, for the reason that in it, in my judgment, centers the main point of debatable difference in regard to the pending bill. I can not but think that it will be very generally conceded that the bill must be amended so as to provide explicitly for some form of judicial review. The question this leaves for serious discussion is as to whether the amendment shall be so framed as to deny to the courts the power to suspend an order of the Commission pending its review. With regard to that proposition I can only say that it is not a question of what the Senate may desire to do, but of what it lawfully can do; and I believe it has been shown that such a provision is impracticable because it is unconstitutional.

A provision for notice and hearing before granting an injunction can easily be provided without the risk of infringing upon chancery powers or constitutional rights by requiring the application for an injunction to be made in a suit against the Commission to be begun before the day fixed for the order to go into effect. This would be before there had been any actual taking of the carrier's property, and therefore a provision for ample notice and hearing would not be subject to the objection that irreparable injury might ensue pending the hearing, as no injury could be sustained until the order became effective.

Mr. President, men of our inheritances repel summary and arbitrary methods, and none the less if these proceed from acknowledged power, accompanied by the mere empty professions and forms of law. Judicial review of every substantial controversy affecting persons and property is a right. This right was painfully won from tyrannies of the past, and is established now beyond the power of any present tyrannies to destroy, in whatever guise they may come, and even if masquerading in the name of the people. This right is to have the rights of the parties in every controversy determined by the courts. Why, then, should there be any doubt on that point in this bill; why should the relative provisions not be clear and explicit? Is it because the friends of this bill doubt the character or capacity of the courts? I have heard that doubt suggested in and out of this Chamber, and I now take leave to raise my voice in protest against the shallow and dangerous notion. Is the relation of the courts to government by the people forgotten? The courts are an integral and vital part of our Government, and it would be a sad day for American civilization if their function were degraded or weakened. They are the balance wheel and check in our system between contending passions and policies. This is not idle rhetoric.

It is the sober truth that the courts are the guardians of our rights and liberties. It is high time that the people should remember this and should soberly reflect upon the current heresies. It is high time that public sentiment and conviction should loyally support the judicial power, recognize the patriotism and good faith of the courts, and maintain their authority and independence. If the derogatory ideas which I have heard relate to State courts, I can not challenge those who are better informed than I as to particular States, but, speaking for my own State, I indignantly repudiate that idea, and as to the Federal tribunals, I assert without fear of contradiction that to their honor, capacity, and just judgments any human controversy may be safely intrusted. If now and then some unworthy judge constitutes an exception that contrast only accentuates the general record of high personnel, character, and ability.

Mr. President, this great subject should be discussed and considered in a spirit of sincerity and courage, far removed from political expediency, or levity, or passion. It is a question affecting the entire country and every section. It concerns vitally great aggregates of the people and each individual citizen. It touches at all points the interests of capital and the interests of labor. It is a question of constitutionality, of fundamental rights, of law. It is therefore a question which peculiarly concerns the lawyers of this Chamber. It would be a reproach to all of us if we should fail in our patriotic duty to give to the study of this question the best that is in us—to bring to bear in candor and honesty all our powers of mind and conscience. But it would be a peculiar reproach to those of us who are lawyers if for lack of intellectual integrity, for want of courage, because of expediency—for any reason short of absolute conviction—we should urge this bill, or, sitting silent, should supinely permit it to become law although believing it to be unconstitutional or illegal and unjust on any ground.

Mr. President, the sense of this responsibility weighs upon me, and has guided me in all that I have thought or said or done in this matter. I trust I do not need here or anywhere to give assurances as to the spirit and motives actuating my public conduct. But it is fitting for me to say in closing my remarks that my course on this important subject of debate before the people of the United States reflects the deliberate judgment of my mind on the legal questions and the deep conviction of my conscience as to my patriotic duty.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, may I ask the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania for a moment? Regarding the power which the Senator seeks to insert in the bill for court review, I wish to ask him whether if Congress to-day should pass a statute absolutely fixing the rates for interstate commerce through the entire country he thinks it would invalidate that statute on constitutional grounds if it failed to make provision for court review?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, it is not necessary for me to take that position under this bill. My contention is not that the bill is unconstitutional because it fails to make provision for court review, but that it is unconstitutional for that reason in conjunction with the provision prohibiting defense in proceedings to enforce the orders of the Commission, and likewise imposing heavy penalties which are intended to keep the carrier from challenging the order of the Commission.

If the Senator from Nevada will kindly excuse me from answering other questions—I am very much fatigued; I expect to be in the debate to the end, and he will have another opportunity.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to press the inquiry further, but I shall avail myself of another opportunity.

THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire now to call up the conference report on House bill 5976.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The conference report has been printed as a document and is on the desks of Senators. It has also been printed in the RECORD by order of the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am not quite familiar with the proceeding, but I desire to have an opportunity to discuss the conference report. To that end I move—and yet I may not be taking the right course—that the Senate disagree to the conference report.

Mr. LODGE. I do not wish to interfere at all with the Senator from Wisconsin, but if he desires the conference report to go over so as to have an opportunity to look further at it——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; I have looked at the report; I merely desire to get it in such form that it can be discussed here.

Mr. CLAPP. That can be done now.

Mr. LODGE. Of course the first motion is to agree to the conference report.

Mr. CLAPP. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the report. The report is open for discussion. The junior Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, against one of the amendments, I think it is the eleventh, I desire to raise a point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado will state his point of order.

Mr. PATTERSON. I may not be able to state it in a few words, but I will try to make myself clearly understood by the Senate.

I would not interpose the point of order did I not feel that the amendment is a very vital one and is liable to do a great amount of injustice to several thousand citizens by blood of the Five Civilized Tribes and its effect must be, in my judgment, to deprive many of them of large property interests that they would otherwise acquire.

The point I make against the eleventh amendment is that it strikes out a provision of the bill that was acted upon favorably by both the Senate and the House of Representatives, and that the conference committee was not appointed for the purpose of revising the act or the acts of both branches of Congress, but was appointed for the purpose of settling, if they could, differences that arose by reason of amendments.

Turning to the report of the conference committee as printed on page 3, I understand this to be the situation of the eleventh amendment: The eleventh amendment made by the Senate consisted of striking out the word "six" and changing it to "seven," so that the proviso reads:

Provided, That the rolls of the tribes affected by this act shall be fully completed on or before the 4th day of June—

Which was changed to March—

1906—

Which was changed to 1907. That was the entire eleventh amendment—the changing of the word "six" to "seven." But not content with agreeing to that amendment the conference committee proceeded to strike out an entire provisio that had no relation to the date that was changed in the Senate and to substitute for that proviso a provision of its own.

The proviso to which I refer is the proviso commencing on line 14, page 3, of the bill. That proviso was a part of the bill as it came to the Senate from the other House, and it remained a part of the bill as it left the Senate. It was not altered to the extent of the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i;" but when the conference committee got together they struck out the deliberate action of the Senate, which was not in dispute at all between the two bodies, and they substituted for that a provision of their own.

Mr. TILLMAN. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. PATTERSON. I am reading from page 3. The amendment to which I refer commences on line 12, page 3, and the proviso that it strikes out commences on line 14, on page 3. I call the attention of the Vice-President again to the proposition that this proviso was in the bill as it passed the other House; it was in the bill as it passed the Senate without any change whatever, and this united action of both bodies has been obliterated from the bill and a new proviso substituted for it. To me it seems quite unusual, quite extraordinary, and must be subject to the point of order.

This is the proviso as it left the House and was approved of by the Senate:

Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed so as to prevent any person to file an application for enrollment in any case where the date for filing application has been fixed by agreement between said tribe and the United States: Provided further, That nothing herein shall apply to the intermarried whites in the Cherokee Nation whose cases are now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States.

The conference committee struck that out bodily and substituted for it the following:

Provided, however, That the decision of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes on a question of fact shall be final.

In the first place, Mr. President, there is nothing cognate between the two provisions. The amendment of the conference committee is to change a rule of evidence; and under the operation of that change the cases of several thousand freedmen and citizens must be most materially affected. I understand, from what I consider very fair and reliable authority, that there are pending in the Indian Territory several thousand cases, in which the parties, by virtue of their relation to the tribes, are seeking to secure lands, moneys, and other property that will come to them by virtue of the status that they may establish in the proceeding before the Commissioner or the Commission, mostly upon the part of those who were freedmen, who are only entitled to 40 acres of land and some proportion of tribal property of another character, who have undertaken to establish their rights in the land as citizens of the tribe; citizens by reason of the fact that they are children or grandchildren of Indians, whether through the father or through the mother.

I submit, Mr. President, that the injustice of a provision of that kind is manifest on its face. The Commissioner, who is made the final tribunal upon all questions of fact, and whose decisions are to be final, is not even a lawyer. He has under him four or more clerks, who, in reality, sit as a court, make their findings, submit them to him, and he, as the Commissioner, finally adjudicates the matter. The presumption is that all hearings are before him; that all the witnesses appear before him as they would before a judge of a court; but the practice is to the contrary, and the practice necessarily prohibits him, on account of the number of litigants, from giving his personal attention to each case. I am informed that so inaccurate, if I may use that term, have been the decisions of the Commissioner in almost innumerable cases that, upon appeal from the Commissioner to the Secretary of the Interior, at least 50 per cent of the decisions of the Commissioner have been reversed, and that is not at all to be wondered at. Not being a lawyer, not being educated in the weight of testimony and giving the proper weight to each witness and to each item of evidence, he commits many blunders.

Now, it is proposed to arbitrarily amend the rule in such manner that the decision of this Commissioner upon questions of fact in future will be held absolutely final. It is because of this manifest injustice that will be done to those who are entitled to have justice done under the law, regulated according to the usual custom in court, that I make the point of order that I do—that the conference committee have struck out an entire proviso, a proviso that was consented to by the other House and the Senate, not a word of it changed while the bill was before either body, and have substituted for it an entire new proviso and one that is altogether different in its aim and in its results from the one that was struck out.

I think, Mr. President, that the point of order must be well taken, in view of what is the scope of the duties of a conference committee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming obtained the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I do not care in this connection to discuss particularly the merits of the change in the bill proposed by the conference committee any more than to say that the Commissioner has opportunities certainly equal to those of the Secretary of the Interior for giving personal attention to these cases. One of the unfortunate conditions in the Indian Territory is the long delay incident to the attempt to settle the affairs of that Territory; and one of the most striking occasions of that delay is the appeal, not only upon questions of law, but upon questions of fact. It was my fortune last fall to visit the Indian Territory, and from every source these complaints came up. It now seems to me, as it did then, that in questions of fact it is better that the decision of the man who is on the ground, possessing more opportunity for investigation than the man sitting in his office in Washington, shall be final as to questions of fact, leaving questions of law to be sent to the Department of the Interior, and by the head of that Department referred to its legal branch.

The fact that the cases to which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] refers have been reversed, to my mind affords no argument against this proposed change. In that country there is a condition existing where the controversy is between Indians and the white people and those who have obtained tribal relations either by marriage or adoption by the tribe itself. An examination of these appeals will show that where the Commissioner has been most often reversed, his decision was in favor of the Indians and the reversal against the Indians. But I do not care to pursue that question further.

The reason the conference committee struck out from line 14 to line 21 is that that was involved in the settlement of the question whether these rolls should be completed in June, 1906, or in March, 1907. I call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that the House never did assent to the language from line 13 to line 21 in connection with a change of those dates. The House bill provided that these rolls should be completed on the 4th day of June, 1906, and, in view of that fact, it was necessary to provide that it should not relate to the intermarried whites whose cases are pending in the courts. But when the House assented to changing that date to March, 1907, giving us the next session of Congress in which to make provision, according as the decision in the intermarried whites case might go one way or the other, it then was mere surplusage to leave that language in the bill.

Section 2 provides for completing this enrollment. It first provides for the taking in of minors who have been born since March 4, 1906, up to that time they being included under the allotment of last year. Then it provides for equalizing the allotments, prohibiting any action after six months from the date of the original selection, or after the expiration of six months from the passage of this act as to allotments heretofore made. Then it changes the date, the whole purview of that condition being in relation to the question of these allotments; and then the House submitted, as the record will show, this addition:

Provided, however, That the decision of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes on a question of fact shall be final.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. HALE. While I have no great familiarity with the subject-matter of this bill, the conference report brings out what is a constantly recurring question in the Senate, whether the conferees have inserted matter neither put in by the House of Representatives nor by the Senate—that is, new matter. It is an old question, as the Senator knows, older than his service here—and valuable service it is—older than my service, and we need always here to scrutinize conference reports. That is done without any reflection upon Senators, but it is to preserve the integrity of legislation. Nothing is so dangerous as the assumption of undue power on the part of a conference committee, no matter how strong the temptation may be to perfect a bill; nothing is so pernicious in legislation as for the conferees to assume, in perfecting a bill, to put in what has not been put in by either House.

I know in the Committee on Appropriations, which deals with almost every subject of legislation, and which has a tremendous power by reason of the important matters that are intrusted to it in conference, some of us old members have to constantly make a contest in conference committees against putting on new matter, regardless of how good the new matter may be, and regardless of how desirable it may be in perfecting the bill.

It is not the province of a conference committee to legislate. The province of a conference committee is to adjust differences, differences between the two Houses, differences that have already arisen, and that appear to need adjustment; but it is not the province of a conference committee to assume what either House should do and put in new matter.

Now, what I want of the Senator is——

Mr. GALLINGER. Or strike out matter not in controversy.

Mr. HALE. A conference committee can not strike out matter not in controversy.

Mr. CLAPP. Of course, I realize, as the Senator suggests, that there is nothing personal to the conferees in anything that may be said.

Mr. HALE. Not in the least.

Mr. CLAPP. Of course, I did feel an added interest in this case because it was put on by the House conferees. But take the language from line 15 to line 21, more especially the second proviso as to the intermarried whites. If a matter in conference between the two Houses changed the date so that that would not longer be pertinent to the view first taken by the House, would it not be proper to strike that out in adjusting these views? I am asking merely for information.

Mr. PATTERSON. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to what has been changed or for what the new matter has been substituted. This is the proviso, commencing on line 10:

Provided, That the rolls of the tribes affected by this act shall be fully completed on or before the 4th day of June—

"June" was stricken out and "March" inserted—nineteen hundred and six.

"Nineteen hundred and six" was stricken out and made "1907." So the amendment up to that point simply changes the time for the completion of the roll.

Mr. HALE. That is, they deal simply with the question of when the thing shall be done and take effect. That is all.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes. Then they proceed to change the rule of evidence, striking out an entire proviso that had no reference whatever to the rule of evidence and that had received the approval of both bodies of Congress, and substituting a new rule of evidence by which thousands of cases are to be governed.

Mr. HALE. That is precisely to what I was going to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], who is a good lawyer and who will see the force of it. The only thing that was brought into controversy by the amendments were the dates. "March" was substituted for "June," and "seven" for "six"—that is, the time when the provision should take effect. That is the only real question that was raised.

Mr. CLAPP. I submit, if the Senator will pardon me, that the second proviso was also involved in that change. That was the expression of the wish of the House if the time were limited to June, 1906. Of course it ceased to be their wish if it was extended to 1907.

Mr. HALE. I see the force of that. How far does that go? Does it follow that because of a change of date the conditions are changed, and that the conferees had a right to put in, instead of the proviso which was left in the bill by both Houses, absolutely a new rule, which is:

That the decision of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes on a question of fact shall be final?

I think, Mr. President, the conference committee has exceeded its power in putting that in, though I see the force of what the Senator says, that the whole subject-matter may have been changed by the change of date. I should like the Senator to explain that; otherwise I should be very clear that introducing this new rule of evidence in place of the proviso that had been left untouched by both Houses is clearly transcending the power of the conferees.

Mr. CLAPP. No; I do not mean that changing the date changed the whole of it. What I meant to say was that changing the date clearly warranted the committee, it seemed to me, in striking out the second proviso. However, that still leaves unimpaired the Senator's objection concerning the addition of the provision in regard to the Commissioner. That I concede, and probably in view of the Senator's opinion of it the objection would be practically decisive.

I should like to ask as a question of practice now—of course this report has to be adopted in whole or rejected in whole, as I understand——

Mr. HALE. I suggest to the Senator that when a conference encounters difficulties of this kind, which, I think, evidently are insuperable—and the Senator is very frank about his statement—the report is withdrawn or it can be voted down, and then the bill goes into conference again.

Mr. CLAPP. I think, in view of the suggestion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]—and certainly his opinion on a matter of this kind ought to be decisive; it would be to my mind anyway—I will take the report back. But there is another question involved.

Mr. TELLER. There are several other questions.

Mr. CLAPP. There are some other questions. My idea was whether in this manner the conferees on the part of the Senate could take the judgment of the Senate in advance upon those other questions, so that we would not have to come back again and perhaps again encounter them.

Mr. HALE. The other questions may be brought up.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to have that done, so that in the next report——

Mr. HALE. We can have those all brought up, and then the conferees on the part of the Senate will be strengthened in their position.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to have that done.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, there are several matters to which I was about to call attention when I yielded to the chairman of the committee [Mr. CLAPP]; but in view of the statement of the chairman that he would like these matters called to attention now, I will make mention of some of them.

I was about to express my reluctance, Mr. President, to in any way criticise a conference report coming from a committee of which I was a member. I simply want the Senator from Minnesota, as I was calling attention to these matters, to be advised as to my objections to the report. There are very many, and they are on various grounds.

First, because I do not believe the conference report reflects in any way the sentiment of the Senate upon the points in difference between the two Houses. That perhaps is not the subject of a point of order; but it is a matter to which I wish to call attention, especially in view of the very great importance of one of the amendments.

It has seemed to me, Mr. President, in looking over the report that the Senate conferees have not been insistent enough perhaps in expressing in the conference the views of the Senate, and I would call attention first, on that line, to the action of the conference committee with reference to the coal lands.

Mr. TELLER. Give us the number of the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am trying to find the amendment now.

Mr. CLAPP. It is 33, I think.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Thirty-three.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is on page 4 of the conference report.

Mr. TELLER. And on page 16 of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Page 16 of the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. On page 4 of the report, amendment No. 33.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes, and it is on page 16 of the bill.

Mr. PATTERSON. What is the number of the amendment?

Mr. TELLER. Thirty-three.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The numbers of the amendments are 33 and 34.

My recollection of that matter is this: The House provision as it came to us was not at all satisfactory to the Senate, as developed here by two or three days of discussion. This matter was so important that the Senate committee spent several days in devising some plan which they thought would be just and proper in dealing with these coal lands, variously estimated in value at from fifteen to fifty million dollars. It was finally determined in the Senate to reject the amendment prepared by the committee, which provided, under careful restrictions, for the disposal of the coal lands; to strike out the House provision for their further lease, and to leave matters exactly as they are at this time, pending further information to be received upon the subject of the coal lands. I think if there was anything in the bill that was carefully considered and carefully voted upon in the Senate it was that very provision.

Mr. President, the result of the conference is not only to undo what we have done in the Senate, but to do what I am sure the Senate never would have done—to concur in full in the House provision. The only change made in the House provision as it came to us, after all the discussion and vote in the Senate, is to insert in line 11 "or until such time as may be otherwise provided by law." The effect of this legislation, if the conference report shall prevail upon that matter, is simply this: It does not even leave this matter in the shape in which it now is, but it virtually instructs the Secretary of the Interior, prior to the time when we meet here again in Congress, to dispose of all that coal land.

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, Mr. President, I beg to call the Senator's attention to the fact that he is mistaken, unless he means to dispose of it by lease.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I mean to dispose of it by lease.

Mr. CLAPP. Oh!

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It makes no difference whether it is disposed of by lease or is sold; it takes it out of the power of Congress ever to legislate, during the time those leases run, with respect to an acre of land, which the Secretary is given a direct invitation to lease as rapidly as possible and before Congress shall again meet in session.

As I said, if there was one thing which the Senate fully discussed in connection with this bill it was this very coal-land proposition, and the result has been not only to set at naught all the discussion, not only to set at naught the desire of the Senate to learn something about the coal lands, not only not to leave it in statu quo, but to go further than can be gone under the existing law and lease the lands. The present law provides against the leasing of any of these coal lands. The law that is proposed goes a step further than that and provides for the leasing of all the lands, and takes the control of them absolutely out of the power of Congress. That is one of the matters in this report to which I wish to call attention.

Mr. BACON. May I ask the Senator from Wyoming a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. With pleasure.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator refer to the word "leased" in the eighth line on the sixteenth page or is it some other section of the bill that he has in view?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Section 13, page 16, of the bill.

Mr. BACON. Yes; that is the one I refer to.

Mr. ALLISON. The last print of the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The last print of the bill. The thirty-fourth amendment of the Senate struck out the provision for leasing. The present law is that there is no authority for leasing. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that under a distinct agreement with the Indians the Secretary of the Interior is prohibited from making any leases of these coal lands. The House, in its wisdom, saw fit to put in a provision for the leasing of these lands by the Secretary, notwithstanding the solemn agreement with the Indians not to lease them. The Senate, when it came to discuss this question, struck out the House provision for the leasing. The conference committee have restored it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that that would be within the province of the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. As I stated to the Senator from Minnesota when he and the Senator from Colorado were engaged in conversation, I urged that not as a technical objection to the report, but for the information of the committee when they went back into conference.

Mr. ALLISON. Let me see if I understand this. Do I understand the Senator to contend that the conference report restores the phraseology from line 12 to line 19?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Exactly.

Mr. ALLISON. The printed report does not so indicate.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; it does.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think it does.

Mr. ALLISON. It says:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33.

Now, what was that amendment?

Mr. CLAPP. That is the language we put in:

Or until such time as may be otherwise provided by law.

That was Senate amendment No. 33.

Mr. ALLISON. What about 34?

Mr. CLAPP. Then the Senate receded from its amendment numbered 34.

Mr. ALLISON. I see.

Mr. CLAPP. The record shows it.

Mr. TELLER. The Senate receded, as the record will show.

Mr. ALLISON. I see now. The Senator is right.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator that the record is not entirely accurate as to the print of this bill. The accurate statement is this: The entire section 13 was stricken out by the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. No.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will finish my statement, and if when I get through it appears that I am mistaken I will be subject to correction.

The entire section was stricken out. A new section was thereupon inserted, which began with the word "section," in line 8, and closed with the word "law," in line 12. I am satisfied of that, because I myself prepared the amendment and offered it on the floor, and it was adopted.

Mr. CLAPP. Was not the language from the word "section," in line 8, a repetition of the House provision?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It was an exact repetition of the House provision, but the House provision was stricken out. But, however that may be, the point to which I call attention is the effect of the action of the conferees, as their report shows; and I wish to call the attention of the conferees to the fact that I do not think a just interpretation of the desires of the Senate——

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Where is it shown that the Senate conferees have receded from Senate amendment numbered 34?

Mr. ALLISON. On the first page of the report.

Mr. TELLER. The first page.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator will find it on the first page.

Mr. McCUMBER. Where is it in the report?

Mr. ALLISON. On the first page of the report.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senate recedes from its amendment numbered 34.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senate recedes from its amendment numbered 34.

Mr. McCUMBER. I see it.

Mr. HALE. It is in the general list.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes. I think it would be very unfortunate, indeed——

Mr. BACON. On what page is the statement that the Senate recedes from its amendment numbered 34?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Page 1 of the report.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senate recedes, as is shown on page 1.

Mr. BACON. I see.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will find it in the general list.

Mr. BACON. I see.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think that is all I care to say upon that particular section, but I will call the attention of the committee——

Mr. ALLISON. Before the Senator leaves that section I should like to ask him whether, as the conferees have reported this provision, it allows the Secretary to go on in the meantime and lease any of these lands?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is a direct invitation to the Secretary to go on and lease the lands, because the law at present prohibits him from leasing any of the lands. This new legislation in the pending bill not only allows him, but is a direct invitation to him to go on and lease from this time on all of the lands that are not already under lease.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator on the floor to amendment 33:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows.

The only amendment of the Senate was to put it "or until such time as may be otherwise provided by law."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. That had reference to the sale?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. I do not remember what that matter was, but I think it was substantially as in this print.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Exactly the same.

Mr. TELLER. Then the conferees add after that:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to ascertain and report by the opening of the next session of Congress if he can secure an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indian tribes to have said coal lands set aside for school purposes, or report a plan for the sale and disposition of said lands.

Then comes the leasing provision——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. And we recede from amendment numbered 34.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that the right to recede with an amendment or to agree with an amendment means an amendment that is substantially——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Germane.

Mr. TELLER. Related to the subject-matter. Here is an entirely new thing, new legislation which has never been before either body.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator whether in debate or in the consideration in either House this feature of ascertaining and reporting by the opening of the session whether the Secretary could secure an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians to have their coal lands set aside for school purposes was up at all?

Mr. TELLER. No; I believe it was not up in the House, because it did not come to us in the bill, and it was not in the Senate, at least, in any shape or manner, nor in the committee.

Mr. HALE. So it is absolutely new matter?

Mr. TELLER. The committee never considered that matter.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. Did I understand the Senator from Maine to ask whether the subject-matter of the amendment had been brought before the Senate?

Mr. HALE. It was not by any action of the Senate. There has been no action at all by the Senate on this subject-matter that I can find; nor was there by the House, either.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am not quite clear in my mind as to whether there was any action of the Senate in regard to the setting aside of these coal lands for school purposes, but it certainly was brought up in the Senate and discussed by the Senator from Texas, I believe.

Mr. HALE. If it was brought up and not adopted, then it makes in favor of the argument that it ought not to be put in here. What I intended to say was that in neither House had this subject-matter been adopted or agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No.

Mr. HALE. If it was discussed and not agreed to, then that makes the action of the conferees all the more objectionable in putting in new matter which was discussed and not adopted by either House.

Mr. DUBOIS. My recollection is that it was not put in the form of a motion. The Senate did not act.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Probably I can refresh the memory of the Senator from Idaho. It was discussed, or some Senator upon the floor expressed the hope that that might be the outcome of legislation in regard to these lands.

Mr. TELLER. At a subsequent time.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; at a subsequent time.

Mr. DUBOIS. Of course the Senator from Wyoming will recall—and I also call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact—that it was stated very distinctly in regard to this and other matters that they were referred to the conference committee with instructions practically to report a new bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should dislike very much to have the Senator from Wyoming called as a witness to that proposition.

Mr. DUBOIS. I do not mean a new bill, but greater discretion was given by the Senate to the conferees than is usually given.

Mr. TELLER. I can relieve the situation, I think. After we had disposed of the thirteenth section and several other things, I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that there were a great many things in the bill that we had amended; and if we left them in that way, if we struck out our own committee amendment, we should, in order that the conferees might pass upon these questions, strike out of the House bill all matter touching that question, and then there would be a chance for the House to recede with an amendment. But of course it must be an amendment touching the very question—not a new amendment, but one that would explain or modify the text. We struck out pretty nearly all of the bill, with the statement that the conferees might have to make a new bill. But it could only be a new arrangement of the matters we had considered either in the Senate or the House and had put in the bill or had knocked out of the bill.

Mr. HALE. I remember very well, if the Senator will allow me, the expression of the Senator and the connection in which it was made, just as he puts it now—that in adjusting these different amendments and differences between the two Houses a new form of bill would be provided; but I had no thought that the veteran Senator from Colorado had in his mind then that the conference committee would be invested with any legislative power.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My objection to the conference report with respect to this particular section was not that a new section had been inserted not germane to the section, which, of course, is true, but my objection went to the subject-matter of the agreement, and to it I wished to call the attention of the chairman of the committee and of the Senate.

If there was another matter more distinctly brought out in the discussion in the Senate than any other, I mean more distinctly after the one I have just referred to, it was the continuance of these tribal relations and tribal governments until the 4th of March, 1907. It was not only agreed in the Senate that the tribal governments should continue, but a joint resolution was passed through both Houses and signed by the President.

Mr. HALE. Offered by whom?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have forgotten who offered it. It was offered——

Mr. HALE. Did not the Senator himself offer it?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] offered it.

Mr. HALE. Certainly he did.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The tribal governments and the tribal relations were continued in force until the 4th of March, 1907. The conference committee have not in so many words in this report repealed that joint resolution, but they have in fact. And why and where? With respect to section 9, this appears on page 3 of the conference report:

And the House agree to the retention of the new matter added by the Senate, from line 4 to line 13, inclusive, on page 11.

Mr. HALE. Where is the Senator reading from? What page of the report?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am reading from page 3 of the report, referring to Senate amendment numbered 24.

Strike out the words "dissolution of the several tribal governments of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes, all records and files of said tribes" and insert in lieu thereof the following: The 1st day of June, 1906, all records and files of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes.

The effect of that is that notwithstanding the tribal governments and tribal relations are continued for a year, on the 1st day of June, 1906, all the records and files of said tribes "shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be removed and deposited with such Government officer or officers as he may designate, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary respecting the removal, deposit, preservation, and in respect of such records."

In other words, the effect of that is to leave upon paper as a legislative enactment the continuance of these tribal relations and governments, but to rob them of all the means and implements and tools for carrying on those governments.

Mr. HALE. Exactly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is further emphasized on page 3:

And the House agree to the retention of the new matter added by the Senate, from line 4 to line 13, inclusive, on page 11; and as agreed to the amendment reads as follows:

"SEC. 9. That upon June 1, 1906, all records and files of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes shall, under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be removed and deposited with such Government officer or officers as he may designate," etc.

As I say, that does not repeal, in so many words, the action of both Houses of Congress by joint resolution and the action of this body on this bill which continues these tribal relations and governments, but it does repeal it by depriving the tribes of the means of carrying on those governments, by taking away from them all their records and all their files and all their implements and machinery of tribal relations and government and having them deposited elsewhere.

Mr. President, there is another point to which I wish to call attention, and this I should have called attention to as being a question of order as to the report. I ask the consideration of the Senator from Minnesota to this point, as to whether or not——

Mr. CLAPP. What page of the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Page 3 of the conference report, where it is proposed to insert, after the word "funds," on page 13, line 15, of the bill, the words:

Provided, That hereafter clerks and deputy clerks of United States courts in the Indian Territory who are ex officio recorders of recording districts in said Territory shall be allowed, out of the fees received for the recording and filing of instruments, 25 per cent in addition to the sum for compensation and actual expenses for clerk hire now provided by law.

There may be some point in the bill to which this is germane, but if there be I have not found it. Certainly neither House of Congress in considering this bill touched upon that matter. There is no reference to it in the action of either branch of Congress. There is no reference whatever in considering this matter to the fees of clerks and depaty clerks of United States courts. Certainly——

Mr. CLAPP. What line of the bill is it?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There may be somewhere in the bill, but I have not been able to find it—certainly it does not occur in section 10, which is the subject-matter of this amendment and conference agreement—a provision to which this is germane.

Mr. CLAPP. There is a provision here which provides for those records. It is barely possible that that amendment may have been inserted at the wrong place. I call the Senator's attention to section 8, which relates to the fees for transcribing records, for certified copies, etc. I am inclined to think the criticism is correct in that the amendment was made to the wrong section.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then does the Senator think that the amendment to section 22 was agreed to by the House without any amendment? The conference report shows——

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; but I think the provision placing the limit on the fees should have been attached to section 8.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is amendment numbered 22?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And the House agreed to the Senate amendment to section 22 without any amendment?

Mr. CLAPP. I know; I say it was probably an inadvertence that this was not dealt with there instead of being attached to section 10.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then I ask the Senator, if it was intended to go on section 10, why does he still believe that it is germane to section 8?

Mr. CLAPP. I would think so. I do not know.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am not interested especially in this, but may I ask the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to another amendment?

On page 5 of the report, section 19 removes all restriction upon alienations and leasing of lands of Indian allottees of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes other than full bloods, except as to homesteads. As I understand it, that allows the absolute sale of all the lands belonging to those mentioned, except the homesteads. The Senator will find it on page 5 of the report.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; I have it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It provides for the sale of the lands, except the homesteads.

Mr. CLAPP. That is, of all but full bloods.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of all who are not full bloods?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. First, it allows the sale, and then it prohibits the leasing.

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or held to authorize the leasing of such lands for oil, gas, or other mineral without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Do I understand that the sale of the land requires the assent of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. CLAPP. No.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then may I ask the Senator what was the purpose, if the Indian can give the greater title without the assent of the Secretary of the Interior, that the less title should be hampered? I am asking for information only.

Mr. CLAPP. I will answer the question.

The Department of the Interior has held, I think without warrant of law perhaps, that removing the restriction as to alienation does not carry with it the power to lease. That is the ruling of the Department. Consequently we removed these restrictions and then left the power to lease subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to ask the Senator this question: If it is the intention to remove the restrictions and give the Indians full power over their lands to sell them, why should you limit their power to lease the lands? That is the question.

Mr. CLAPP. I think the Senator will find that the leasing restriction is broad and applies to full bloods as well as mixed bloods.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But this specifically says, in the first place, that the restrictions upon alienations and leasing by Indians of less than full blood are, except as to homesteads, removed after the 1st day of July, 1906; and then it proceeds to limit it:

That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or held to authorize the leasing of such lands for oil, gas, or other mineral without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CLAPP. We felt that possibly it would be safe to allow them to alienate, as they would exercise more judgment probably in getting fair compensation for their land and there would be less opportunity to get it for less than its value than under leases. So we put in this safeguard—that they shall not lease the lands for oil and other purposes without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then, acting as men who are relieved from all restrictions upon their land, they are compelled to sell their land if they want to get anything out of it, and are not allowed to lease it from year to year.

Mr. CLAPP. That is true, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In other words, they must make a sale of the lands, and will not be allowed to get any revenue from it by leasing it.

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, yes; they can get a revenue from it if the Secretary of the Interior allows them to lease it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If they allow somebody else to lease it for them; but they are not allowed to handle it in regard to leasing it, and they are allowed to handle it in regard to selling it. That seems to me to be a singular provision.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I tried to explain that. This thing is not the easiest in the world to handle between the Department on the one hand and the people on the other. There is one individual who seems never to be thought of here, and that is the Indian. The Indians have to do this.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I supposed the object of the provision was to confer a favor upon the Indian and allow him to deal with the lands. It certainly allows him to sell his land. I think it ought to allow him to lease his land unrestricted and give him some hold upon his land, so that he will not be compelled to sell it.

Mr. CLAPP. I felt, in the adoption of this amendment, that an Indian would be more likely to get his full value in the sale than he would in some lease, which to him would not seem, perhaps, to amount to very much. For that reason, wisely or unwisely, we inserted the provision. Now, that is the only explanation that is to be made of it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am obliged to the Senator for the explanation.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Indian sells his land at an inadequate price he is remediless; it is gone.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. But if he leases his land at an inadequate rental he is not remediless, because he still has title to the land, and when the lease has expired he can try this business operation again.

Mr. CLAPP. If the lease includes a term of years that takes the value out of the land in the shape of oil he would not have much of a remedy. It was the wisdom of the Senate we were acting on as to leaving him with the right to sell without restriction, because the Senate amendment to that effect was adopted.

Mr. SPOONER. I may be wrong about it, but it seems to me it is infinitely better for the Indian not to remove the restriction upon his power of alienation, but to grant him only the power to lease, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, if that can be done, because the whole object of such restrictions is upon the theory that the Indian is unable to take care of himself in business transactions; that he falls an easy prey to the white man who plies him with drink and in various ways beguiles him into parting with his property. The whole basis of such legislation is the assumption that the Indian in point of business intelligence and commercial acuteness is not on a par with the average white man.

Mr. HALE. He needs a guardian.

Mr. SPOONER. He needs a guardian; and it does not safeguard his interest, it does not protect him at all against the wiles of the men who follow up the Indians to get away from them their land to confer upon him an absolutely unrestricted power of alienation and yet leave him where he can not lease the land.

Mr. TELLER rose.

Mr. SPOONER. Am I wrong about it?

Mr. TELLER. I will tell you later.

Mr. SPOONER. If I am wrong I wish the Senator would tell me now.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Wyoming will allow me.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg pardon of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that there are no Indians in the Indian Territory.

Mr. SPOONER. They are all American citizens?

Mr. TELLER. They are all American citizens. They have disappeared as Indians.

Mr. SPOONER. Then what right have you to provide——

Mr. TELLER. I do not think we have any.

Mr. SPOONER. That he shall not lease his land without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. TELLER. There is a decision of the Supreme Court made in a certain case which would indicate, possibly, they might claim that control over the property extended some time after they became citizens, because in the deed or patent there were certain restrictions or limitations. It seemed to me, if I may be allowed to say so, that when they became citizens those restrictions were removed by law. That is the way I look at it.

Mr. SPOONER. Then why this provision removing them by law?

Mr. TELLER. I have not been in favor of removing them by law. I have been in favor of asserting that they were removed already.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will answer the Senator. It was universally held that they were not removed until removed by statute.

Mr. TELLER. It is an incumbrance on the property that he can not sell it. For that reason we felt it proper to make it possible for him to sell it. I believe the court would hold that he has a right to sell it anyway.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me one moment. We are told of something the Senate did not put in, and the next moment we are asked why something is done that the Senate did put in. So far as absolutely removing all restrictions as to less than full bloods and absolutely prohibiting all alienation on the part of full bloods the Senate did that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then, as I understand the Senator from Minnesota in answer to my inquiry, it is the fact that this section as agreed to by the conference removes all restrictions on the sale of the land of everyone except the full bloods. It places, however, a restriction as to the leasing of the lands for oil, gas, or other mineral, leaving it to the Senate to judge whether that is a consistent or a wise provision or not.

Now, there is only one other matter to which I wish to ask the attention of the chairman, and I should like the attention of the Senator from Colorado also. My recollection is that there was a provision made by the Senate in considering the bill by which certain freedmen were allowed 40 acres only by allotment. It was proposed, and, I think, carried in the Senate, to increase the amount of land which they might acquire. My recollection is that they were allowed to purchase at the appraised value an additional 40 acres. I think the Senator from Colorado was concerned in that matter, and I ask him if that was the action of the Senate?

Mr. TELLER. No; not quite. There were some of them who got less than 40 acres because they were to receive the value of certain land, and it was provided that to make up the 40 acres they could take additional land by buying it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is, to make up to 40 acres?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That answers the question, and I have nothing further to say on that point.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Wyoming allow me to ask him whether he is talking about the clause on page 5 of the conference report where it says:

Strike out the words "one hundred and sixty," in line 3, on page 21, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "forty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. We put it, I understand, at 160 acres.

Mr. TELLER. That is, they might buy enough to make up 160 acres?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. They might buy enough more land at the appraised value in addition to or with the allotment of 40 acres to make up to 160 acres.

Mr. CULLOM. Let me ask the Senator another question. In this paragraph of the conference report the words "one hundred and sixty" are stricken out and the word "forty" put in. What would a person get out of that now?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Forty acres.

Mr. CULLOM. Provided he has 40 acres already?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. He does not get any.

Mr. CULLOM. Suppose he has 20 acres?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. He gets 20, I understand.

Mr. CLAPP. I think that ought to be explained, perhaps.

These lands were allotted upon a basis of a cash value of the allotment—that is, the lands were appraised and then an allotment was figured, we will say, at $400. I think it was at about $11. Then the allottee was permitted to take as much land as the appraised value would equal the value of the allotment. That sometimes would be less than 40 acres, of course. The object of this provision was to enable these men to come in at the old price, which is a mere gratuity to them, and take enough land to make up what they already had—40 acres. Every acre that they are allowed to take under that condition is, in a measure, in derogation of the right of the Indian. The Senate raised it to 160 acres, not that they might come in and have the preference right to buy 160 acres at its present value, but that they could go back and do what the Indian can not do, file up to 160 acres on the old price. The conferees settled on 40 acres. That is the only explanation of that provision.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Wisconsin yield to his colleague?

Mr. SPOONER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank my colleague. Mr. President, I could not quite hear what the Senator in charge of the conference report said with respect to the provision that the Commissioner of the Five Civilized Tribes is to be given jurisdiction to determine finally all questions of fact which may come before him.

Mr. CLAPP. On account of that having been asked for by the House I felt it proper to defend it as well as I could, but the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is unquestionably an authority on that matter, felt that it was not within the order and was subject to a point of order. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I withdrew it from consideration.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then that goes out?

Mr. CLAPP. It goes out.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wished to address myself to that provision if it was still to be defended by the conferees. Since it is withdrawn it is unnecessary to say anything with respect to it.

But, Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate briefly upon that portion of the conference report which deals with the coal lands of the Indian Territory. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], in referring to the value of these coal lands, said they were easily worth from $10,000,000 to $50,000,000. Right at the outset the Senate can be impressed with the fact that they are dealing with property the value of which is greatly in excess of that sum.

There can be no better authority for the value of these coal lands than the United States Geological Survey. Under its direction these lands have been carefully surveyed with respect to coal deposits.

There are 437,734 acres of coal lands in the Indian Territory. The veins of ore, in so far as the outcroppings will indicate, have been carefully located. Of that amount 104,000 acres, or a little less than one-fourth, have been leased. The Indians receive 8 cents per ton as a royalty under these leases. This yields upon the average $400 per acre in royalties alone. I am assured by the Geological Survey that this would be a fair average for the royalties upon the remaining unleased lands.

This is a most remarkable deposit of coal, running from bituminous coal of not a very high grade up to almost anthracite in quality. There is no other like deposit, so far as I am able to ascertain, of bituminous coal in the country.

Applying the ascertained value of the royalties in so far as these coal lands have been mined to the remaining lands, the computation would show all the lands to be worth in royalties alone $175,000,000.

I believe if the Senate can get even an approximation to the importance of the subject with which we are dealing, it will call a halt here and now upon any further disposal of these lands until the resolution offered by the Senator from Wyoming for an investigation of this whole matter shall have been passed, an investigation made under it, and the results reported to the Senate.

The value of this coal as mined out is from $1.90 to $2 a ton at the mine. Taking $2 per ton as the value of the coal at the mouth of the mine, it means that there is a value of coal deposit in these lands upon the average of $10,000 per acre. Applying this figure to the entire acreage makes a total valuation of $4,377,000,000 for these coal lands in the Indian Territory, something more, I think, than a third of the capitalized value of all the railroads of the country.

Mr. President, the Senate should proceed with extreme caution in dealing with property of this immense value.

What is our responsibility with respect to it? The Government is the trustee of the Indians who own it. Their interest must be protected to the last dollar. Whenever disposed of, it is the duty of the Government to protect the public which is dependent upon these lands for fuel.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCUMBER in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. Can the Senator tell us how long these leases run?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the leases run for thirty years. I was about to say, Mr. President, that the proposition made in this conference report to lease these lands is equivalent to the sale of them. When this bill was before the Senate it refused to sanction a sale under any conditions. We spent two days in discussing the section which provided for sale and then the entire proposition was voted out of the bill. As the Senate left it when that section was laid upon the table, there was no authority or direction to anybody to dispose of a single acre of it.

Now it comes back to us in the form of a conference report, which, as the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] has made entirely plain to this body, amounts to a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to proceed to the leasing of the residue of these lands. Between this time and the time when Congress shall again meet every acre may be thus disposed of. But it will be claimed that the Secretary of the Interior can protect the interests of the Indians and the interests of the public.

The Secretary of the Interior has many duties to discharge; he has upon his hands a vast Department dealing with great questions and great problems; this is a small portion of it; and with respect to this I think it is fair to presume that he must, in large measure, depend upon the suggestion of subordinates in his Department. The Secretary of the Interior will not give personal supervision to everything which issues from his Department. Why, Mr. President, when the subcommittee presented this bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs it provided for the sale of these coal lands in a way which would have protected neither the interests of the Indians nor the interests of the public. We were informed by the chairman that the provision came from the Interior Department. It proposed to sell all of the coal lands. They were to be appraised. One appraiser was to be selected by the Indians, one to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior, and one to be selected by the lessees of those coal lands. It contained a further provision that the lessees were to have the right for a period of some months after the appraisal to take the lands at the appraised value. There was to be no open sale. They were not to be sold to the highest bidder. It was also provided that the lands were to be appraised without taking into account the value added by mining development.

I do not mention this as a reflection upon the Department of the Interior, but merely to suggest that we should not impose too many burdens upon a great Executive Department of the Government.

So, I say, Mr. President, that we must proceed with the greatest caution. We should take a lesson from the conditions existing with respect to the coal lands already leased in the Indian Territory, through the Interior Department, under provisions for which Congress is responsible. What is the situation there at the present time as to the portion of the land already under lease? There are 113 leases and 52 of them are openly under the control of railroad companies. There are five railroad companies whose lines run through this coal region. These roads connect with lines which distribute this coal over something like 10,000 miles of railroad. There is a vast area of country dependent upon the coal of the Indian Territory for fuel. Within the next five years not less than 10,000,000 people will take their fuel supply from these coal lands. As to the lands already leased, the public are completely at the mercy of these railroad companies. Their control is absolute. They dictate as to conditions and prices.

Every railroad company, I think, whose lines cross the coal lands of the Indian Territory secured its right of way under acts of Congress which impose a certain specific obligation upon them, and it is very interesting to note what that obligation is.

When the railroad rate discussion was on here the other day a controversy arose between the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] with respect to whether there had ever been any legislative construction of the constitutional provision regarding the right of Congress to fix rates. The charter of the Texas Pacific Railroad Company was cited as bearing on that question.

The Senator from Texas contended that in granting that charter Congress fixed transportation charges under the commerce clause of the Constitution. The Senator from Ohio contended that the Government imposed the condition with respect to rates under its proprietary right to grant it a franchise and impose any condition it pleased. But, Mr. President, in every one, I think, of the five Congressional acts which permitted these railroad companies to cross these Indian lands there was a provision regulating the rates that they should charge in the Indian Territory. Sometimes the regulation was imposed with respect to one adjoining State as the standard and sometimes with respect to another State as the standard.

I have here before me, Mr. President, the rates charged upon coal transported by one of these railroad companies as compared with the rates in Texas fixed as the standard for this road in the law granting it a right of way through the Indian Territory.

Freight rates on coal from Wilburton, on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad, successors to the Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railway, in the Choctaw district, Indian Territory, compared with the rates on coal for similar distances in the State of Texas.

NOTE.—The rates between points in Texas are on single line haul. When haul is over two or more lines, the rate is greater. The rates quoted to Indian Territory points are also for single-line haul, so that the comparison is fair.

It is unnecessary to consume more time in taking up each one of these roads with reference to the States with whose rates they were bound to comply. Enough has been said to show the violation of the provisions of the right of way under which they went into the Indian Territory.

It is impossible for an independent coal operator to get fair treatment in the Indian Territory as elsewhere in the country, when he comes in competition with transportation companies engaged in the same business. I have some letters from residents of Indian Territory and from others who have investigated the situation. They show clearly the bad results of leasing the 104,000 acres under the existing law. With permission of the Senate, I will have them printed in connection with what I have said on the subject.

Now, Mr. President, I believe it to be the duty of Congress to withhold every acre of land remaining in Indian Territory from disposal either by sale or lease until Congress is more fully informed upon the subject than it is at this time. If, however, the lands are to be leased, it should be understood by this body that leasing is equivalent to sale. A lease covers a period of time that enables those taking it to work out the coal, and that is equivalent to selling the mineral rights of the land. Whether sold or leased the Government has absolute control. It is bound, in dealing with this important question, to indicate its position clearly and specifically. It should see to it that no railroad company becomes the owner of the products which it transports over its lines in competition with other producers.

So I say that if the conferees are going to yield to a proposition in this bill that these lands shall be leased, they should insist that the lands shall be leased only under restrictions and limitations that shall absolutely exclude the railroad companies from becoming the holders, either in the first instance or by assignment, of any of those leased lands. To effect this it will be necessary to provide that the lands shall not be leased to railroad corporations nor to the officers or the stockholders of railroad corporations, nor assignable to railroad corporations or to the officers or stockholders of railroad corporations or to anyone else acting directly or indirectly for them. Otherwise they will eventually pass into the hands of those who will simply stand as the representatives of the railroad company for the purpose of controlling these coal lands and the shipment of the coal in competition with independent producers. I believe there should be incorporated in such lease not only the provisions I have suggested, but the provision that the lease shall become absolutely void upon being so assigned.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether he does not think it would be better to provide, if possible, that the remaining lands shall neither be sold nor leased until the Secretary of the Interior shall report to Congress a plan for their disposal, so as to prevent the lands falling into the hands of a monopoly, whether that monopoly be a railroad company or any other kind of a company?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think that would be a good provision, but I would supplement it by adopting the resolution offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], that the Senate shall make an independent and thorough investigation and report to this body at the next session. Such an investigation will aid us in considering any recommendation made by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was not aware that such a resolution had been submitted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask leave to print, in connection with the remarks I have made, certain papers relating to the matters with which I have dealt.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The papers referred to are as follows:

MUSKOGEE, IND. T., March 15, 1906.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 7th instant, acknowledging mine of the 28th ultimo, was received while I was engaged in a little investigation of my own to ascertain the conditions pertaining in the southern section of the Territory. What I have learned convinces me that the only remedy—the only course to be pursued—is the one suggested by you—i. e., lease the coal lands under restrictions preventing the railroads either directly or indirectly geting control of them.

These lands should by no means be sold, for two reasons: (1) It would be impossible at present to get what they are worth if thrown on the market; (2) restrictions against the ownership of more than a certain number of acres would be an absolutely dead letter after the lands are out of the control of the Government, in view of the many ways to evade such a law and the difficulty not only to prove violations, but to enforce the law after proof.

Looking at the matter from the standpoint of material good to the greatest number, I believe the following is obvious:

To sell at present, the true value will not and can not be realized. The profits would therefore go to the railroads and other allied corporations, who are bound to get them. By keeping the fee under restriction and leasing for the benefit of the Indians, the latter would have an income for some years, and they will need it badly. Then when the lands are finally sold the natural increase in value owing to the settlement of the country, with its increased demands for fuel, will be distributed, not among a few corporations, to be removed from the Territory, but among the entire people through the natural channels of trade.

By keeping these lands in the control of the Government, with proper restrictions, it will be possible to enforce a law prohibiting the control—a monopolistic control—of this public necessity. If left in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior with a proviso that any violation shall make the lease void (not voidable, thus throwing the necessity for action on the delinquent), it will be much better.

However, conditions are rather discouraging, and it looks like an impossibility to prevent the despoilation of these people—ultimately, I mean. Should it be possible to have the recording of fraudulent deeds made a crime, it would at least have a deterrent effect. Such a law would not only provide for making it a crime to taking an instrument with intention to defraud, but should apply to the "knowingly recording, attempting to record, or causing to be recorded, or knowingly to accept title so derived." This would catch many outstanding instruments.

Thanking you for your courtesy, and wishing you every success in your efforts to restrain within legal bounds those who by their powerful influence appear to be able to violate law with impunity, I am,

Very truly,

C. G. STEPHENSON.

NEW YORK, February 20, 1906.

Senator LA FOLLETTE, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: You are on the right track. "There is lots of meat in this cocoanut."

The Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad runs from the Arkansas line to Ardmore over a solid bed of coal down a valley from a quarter to a mile wide. I once thought of trying for some of this land myself, but I found "the railroad had no cars," and knowing "the game," having been a railroad man, I kept out and did not join "Les Miserables" who had already invested. If you will look up the early charterers, builders, owners, and head railroad men of the Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf you will find the Pennsylvania cloven foot sticking out in every direction, such as Wistars, Browns, etc.

You will also find the Goulds, I think, as they were "boring" all through the Territory. If you will call on the Interior Department to expose the various leases and terms, I think you will uncover the biggest thing you have seen in a long time.

I recollect three years back, when I was up in the Creek Nation, there was to be a survey and leasing of Indian oil lands. People told me there that when they went to Washington to file their leases they found them all covered by pets—Cudahy and others.

The only solution of this problem is to reserve all terminal rights to and for the Indians in perpetuity and allow them the usufruct from mining the same in the shape of a royalty of 25 per cent of the sale price.

Yours,

JNO. REED.

HOWE, IND. T., March 20, 1906.

Senator LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I notice there is a motion in the Senate to investigate the coal lands in the Indian Territory. Now, if there is an investigation we would like you to see that the leases at and around this town of Howe be especially investigated. There are five leases of about 920 acres each held here, I think, originally by the Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railway Company and perhaps subsidized by that company to the Mexican Gulf Coal and Turpentine Company.

Now, of the five leases aforesaid, they are only working one, and there never has been any coal taken from any of the other four leases, except three or four years ago. The Mexican Gulf Coal and Transportation Company started to open up a slope on another, but soon abandoned the work on it. How can they hold the four leases which they do not work, and keep other people from working them or buying them? They may have put in coal from the only one that they work and claim it is from the other leases.

Now, if you can do anything to have the surface of the coal lands sold, please do so, for our town is in the midst of a huge body of segregated coal lands, and if the lease system is continued our town will be dead.

Respectfully,

HOWARD WELLBORN.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, there is one view of this matter which I think ought to control the Senate in its action on the report of the conference committee. It is this: The proposition before the Senate, when the bill was under consideration with reference to the thirteenth section, was that these leases should be made without restriction. The junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] called the attention of the Senate to the matters about which he has so earnestly spoken to-day, and, in consequence of suggestions made by him and information which he gave to the Senate, it was entirely evident that the Senate would not enact this provision into law without very material amendment, by which amendment it was intended to restrict the railroad companies, and any persons acting in their interest, from controlling these coal mines, having both control of the product and of the transportation at the same time—a matter which has been recently condemned by the Supreme Court of the United States in a case which we have had recently so often cited.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me, as I understood the discussion on that day, although I admit that by the time we got into the plan of the Government to purchase these lands the matter became somewhat complicated—but as the matter was presented here the suggestions of the Senator went to the proposition that had been reported to the Senate for the sale of the lands.

Mr. BACON. I did not catch what the Senator said.

Mr. CLAPP. I say the proposition of throwing around those lands restrictions as to ownership, as I understood at the time, went to the proposition that had been reported to the Senate for the sale of the lands. I certainly understood that the rejection of the House plan was simply for amendment, so that it might go into conference; and, while the Senate was not ready to sell the land, in view of the fact that we had prohibited the leasing when we authorized the sale two years ago, that now prohibiting the sale was for the purpose of restoring the power to lease.

Mr. BACON. I had not fully stated my proposition before the Senator suggested his view of it.

I was trying to recall to the Senate the history of what occurred. The Senator will remember the very earnest debates we had upon that question, in which were discussed the very great evils of permitting the railroad companies to be at once the producers of coal and the transporters of coal. The very large interests involved were set forth and presented to the Senate by the junior Senator from Wisconsin, as he has done to-day with equal earnestness and with equal clearness. The point to which I desire to direct the attention of the Senate at this time in reference to the precise question whether or not this report should be agreed to is this: That that discussion, I think, while no vote was taken in regard to this matter, had brought the Senate to a point where they certainly would not have authorized either the sale or the lease of this property without amendments which would guard against the possibility of the railroad companies which were to haul this coal being at the same time the owners and producers of the coal. Now, Mr. President, that there was a disposition to restrict the railroad companies as such, but because of the manifestly proper objection against the railroad companies which were engaged in the transportation of it being at the same time the owners and controllers of the product of coal.

That discussion went on; one amendment after another was suggested, and the matter was nearing a point where a satisfactory solution was about to be reached by the Senate, when a suggestion was made that a still more perfect remedy would be found in the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, if I recollect aright, to strike the section out entirely. That was adopted by the Senate, not because the Senate viewed with disfavor the suggestions of the Senator from Wisconsin or with disfavor the amendments which were then being presented to the Senate for the purpose of accomplishing that which he advocated, but because it was deemed that the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado would more perfectly effectuate the purpose of removing altogether the right of the authorities to either sell or lease these lands until there should be further information and further authority on the part of the Government.

The bill goes into conference in that condition without the amendments which we otherwise would have put upon it; it goes with the naked proposition authorizing these leases. If the proposition to authorize leases had gone to the conference with the approbation of the Senate, it would have gone there with these restrictive amendments. As it was, being stricken out altogether with only sufficient amendment put in to carry it to conference, it goes there without the restrictive amendments; so that when the proposition now is to recede from the action of the Senate, the effect of it will be to restore the original proposition, without the amendments which the Senate put upon it, as we would have put upon it if the section had not been entirely stricken out.

I think the Senator from Wyoming is absolutely correct in his presentation of the matter, that to agree to the report is to surrender entirely that which we had intended to prescribe as the conditions upon which there should be hereafter any sale or lease; and, if we adopt the report, we put it within the power of the Interior Department, or those acting for it, not only to lease these lands without restriction, but we put it without their power to make any restriction; and the very evils complained of, and, I think, very justly and properly complained of in the presentation of the Senator from Wisconsin, will be those which will be realized and which we will fail utterly to meet or to try to guard against.

I think, therefore, Mr. President, that, outside of all other questions, so far as the report of the committee is concerned with reference to the thirteenth section, there should be no question that we should reject the report. I am only sorry, Mr. President, that all the Senators who may possibly be called upon to vote on this question were not here to hear the presentation of the subject made by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CLAPP. There is nothing to vote on. A point of order was raised, I think, by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] and was advocated by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. The point of order carried the whole report with it. There was no objection, however, to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] going on with his remarks.

Mr. TILLMAN. What becomes of the bill?

Mr. CLAPP. It goes back to conference, of course.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator had stated that to me before I began—I did not really hear what the Senator from Maine said, as he spoke in a very low tone—I should have had no desire to occupy the time of the Senate. I am only after practical results.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that this entire discussion was invited by the Senator from Minnesota when he withdrew the report, saying he would like to have the views of the Senate upon it.

Mr. BACON. I did not hear either statement.

Mr. CLAPP. But I was calling the attention of the Senator to the fact that no vote could be had upon this provision. The discussion was desired simply to get the sense of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I did not know that fact when I took the floor, or I should not have occupied the time of the Senate. I understand, however, though I did not then know the fact, that the Senator had invited an expression of views.

Mr. CLAPP. I had.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was not in the Senate when this matter originally came up, but I have had occasion to examine somewhat into this question of coal and railroad monopolies of coal, and I have some very radical views in regard to this Indian Territory deposit of coal, which has been shown by the Senator from Wisconsin to be very valuable. It seems to me—in fact, I have information to this effect that has come from all directions since I have been placed in charge of the railroad rate bill—that at this moment the railroads of this country have practically monopolized the fuel supply of the United States—that is, speaking broadly. Of course there are private operations, and there are large areas of coal lands which are not yet in the possession, by purchase or lease, of the railroads, but for all practical purposes the coal which is now being mined is almost wholly under the control of the railways of the country; they very largely fix the price to the consumers throughout the country, and they are very energetically pursuing the policy of securing the control of all the balance of the coal lands in the country.

But speaking of this particular area of coal land, I want to make this observation, that when you consider that there is a region of treeless prairie, where there is only an occasional cottonwood or willow on the banks of a stream, and all of that country is dependent upon coal for fuel, it becomes a great public responsibility for those of us who have to deal with this particular subject now—we will have to deal with the broader subject later—I say it becomes a matter of very deepest concern that we should not make any false step in the disposition of the coal in the Indian Territory.

The United States Government once owned this land, and we donated it or sold it or gave it to the Indians in exchange for their lands east of the Mississippi. In our rôle of guardian, looking out for the interests of the Indians, we ought not to forget that we are also guardians for the white people, and that the interests of the millions of farmers now out there and to be there ought to be looked after in connection with caring for this coal deposit, which will be the future coal supply of the men who will make homes in Oklahoma and the Indian Territory and northern Texas and Kansas and Wyoming, and all that other region over there. The Almighty has been very generous to us in this country in giving us the great blessing of fuel scattered broadcast almost, except on the South Atlantic coast. But this particular body of land being under our jurisdiction, and to be disposed of by lease, sale, or otherwise by us as guardians for the Indians, the question that presents itself to my mind is whether we ought not simply to withdraw this land from sale to anybody; let the United States appraise it and set apart a reasonable amount of purchase money, the interest on which shall be paid to the Indians, and hold this coal deposit in perpetuity, so as to furnish coal at reasonable price to the millions of people who will live in that region in the future, without having those people subjected to the levy of tribute by railroads and capitalists, who will certainly get control in one way or the other, just as they now absolutely control the anthracite coal fields in Pennsylvania, levying tribute upon the millions of people who have to use anthracite every day in their lives, and charging them a dollar to a dollar and a quarter or a dollar and a half a ton more than a reasonable and fair price. If we will do wisely we will buy these lands from the Indians and hold them by the United States Government, and let the Government lease them under such conditions as will afford to the millions who will live there fuel at a reasonable price.

Now, why do I say this? Among my numerous correspondents, who have buried me under letters of one kind and another, many of them unduly complimentary and laudatory of my patriotic efforts in endeavoring to help the President get a good railroad rate bill, I have one from the secretary of a farmers' association at Edmond, Okla., and listen to what he says. I will leave out the compliments to the cornfield lawyer. It would be in bad taste for me to read them. The Senator might read them if the letter came to him. I will merely go to the milk in the cocoanut in regard to coal:

> Now I am going to call your attention to the discrimination of the Santa Fe Railroad against our little town of Edmond. We are about halfway between Guthrie and Oklahoma City. We pay $8 a ton for coal and are only about 125 miles from the mines in South McAlester.

Eight dollars a ton for bituminous coal. The writer goes on to say:

> Now, the Santa Fe Railroad will not haul our coal 16 miles from Oklahoma City and will not receive it there from the Rock Island Railroad. But we are compelled to use coal from Colorado. Why? Because the Santa Fe gets the long-haul freight. Why don't you look after the Rock Island Railroad Company, who owns the old corporation which was the Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad?

Well, we are trying to look after the Rock Island, including the others

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me say right here that there may be one additional reason for the insistence on the part of the Santa Fe Railway Company that the coal should be delivered from Colorado, and that is the fact that the Santa Fe Company, according to my recollection, is a very large stockholder in the Victor Coal Mining Company, in south Colorado——

Mr. TILLMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The corporation referred to by the junior Senator from Colorado the other day as holding a very large area of land in south Colorado which twenty or thirty years past was the property of the entire people of the United States as public lands.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; and we sold it or gave it away.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Gave it away.

Mr. TILLMAN. Corporations now own it, corporations which levy tribute on this farmer and every other farmer in that region, and then this particular corporation refuses to make connecting rates with the line that runs to South McAlester, a hundred and twenty-five miles away, which would enable it to haul domestic coal to the people living in the neighborhood, but brings it six or seven hundred miles from its own mines in Colorado, and says to these people, to this cornfield—not lawyer, but farmer—"What are you going to do about it?" and he writes to me. I want to ask the Senate, What are you going to do about it?

Let me go on:

> Don't you know they virtually own all the coal lands on their line in the Indian Territory?

These very lands about which the Senator from Wisconsin has been telling us and which we are talking of leasing and selling and turning Mr. Hitchcock loose under the House provision and the conference report, if we were to adopt it. He says:

They surveyed the coal beds before they located the road, and leased all the coal lands from the Indians and Government officials, and with all the watchfulness of the Secretary of the Interior they are still so held.

If the junior Senator from Wisconsin could go a little further and get all the facts, he would find that instead of out of the hundred and thirty coal leases only fifty or sixty, whatever the figures are, about half, being in possession of the railroads, I will bet you—no; I will take that back; I will not bet here; but still I would be willing to put up some money to back my judgment—that the railroads to-day, by one instrumentality or another, by transfer or lease, or by having some bogus lessee who is their friend and ally, control all of those lands, and if they do not actually control them they control the output and the price, and the private operators, if there be any, are to-day as helpless as the private operators are in West Virginia.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I was understood as saying that the 52 leases out of the 130 were all the leases that are controlled by the railroads, I did not express myself clearly. Fifty-two of the worked leases are controlled by the railroads. That they control unworked leases, I have some indubitable evidence in my possession. I have one complaint from a citizen in Howe, in the Indian Territory, in which it is stated that near that town there are four of these leases, each lease covering something over 960 acres of land. A little less than a thousand acres of land is taken in under each lease. There are four of those leases near the town of Howe, in the Indian Territory. Three of them are not worked at all. One of them is worked. They are all of them controlled and owned by railroad companies. Three of them are not worked; one of them is worked.

The figures I gave of the fifty-two leases included those now being mined. Of the unworked leases I am unable to say how many are under the control of the railroads

Mr. TILLMAN. I will repeat my parliamentary phrase. I will bet, if you could get at the bottom facts, you would find that practically every one of those leases is to-day controlled directly or indirectly by the railroads.

Let us proceed with my cornfield friend:

It is thought by the people living here that H. C. Frick had a large interest in the deal of the sale of the Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad to the Rock Island. Those things are just what the American people think or have no means of finding out the real status of affairs. The cornfield lawyer is always awake, however—

He means himself—and with all of Uncle Sam's school-learned lawyers they allow such fellows as McMurray Cornish and other small fry to get nearly $1,000,000 in fees.

Hoping you will have success in your new rôle, and that your State may keep you in the Senate,

For my fellow-farmers, I remain,

Respectfully, yours,

S. W. MURPHY,
Corresponding Secretary.

Now, here is a man, and there are just about seven or eight millions like him, I should say, good Republicans and Democrats all over this country, who are loyal to their party, loyal to their country, taxpayers, patriots, appealing to the Senate of the United States to give them such a law in regard to railroad management and regulation as will put a stop to the outrages of which he speaks in connection with this coal business.

I do not hesitate to repeat what I have said once or twice before, for it ought to be repeated until the country begins to take notice of it, that the fuel supply of the United States is to-day largely in the hands of railroad corporations, who monopolize it, and they are continuing to reach out to get the balance, and unless Congress takes some steps to stop, to prevent, to punish, if need be, the combination of the production of coal and its transportation by any hocus-pocus or hook or crook, nobody knows what will come, because if another anthracite coal strike comes in the winter, comes when the people are freezing, and these thirty or forty millions of people off East and Northeast and around here to Canada who use anthracite coal are confronted by their inability to get coal to keep their families warm, gentlemen, there will be something doing in the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, only a few moments. I understand that this report is to go back to the conference committee, and therefore while the Senate is not to vote upon it, it is not improper for Senators to give expression to the views they entertain upon the subject, perhaps in a way for the guidance of the Senate conferees, provided it is entitled to weight in future deliberations upon this bill.

It was clearly understood when the bill passed the Senate, I think it was almost the unanimous sentiment in the Senate, that for several reasons these coal lands ought not to be sold. The proposition which was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and which was much debated here and to which amendments were proposed, was one authorizing the sale of these lands and an attempt to protect the trust estate and the public interests by restrictions to be wrought into the conveyance.

It is almost impossible, as I said in a single sentence in that debate, efficiently to protect the public interest by limitations upon the power of alienation. It is difficult to conceive, if it be possible to conceive, of restrictions which would not be easily susceptible of evasion, and practically, except perhaps here and there a case, inoperative. The proposition that the Secretary of the Interior shall be permitted, without limitation other than that contained in the House bill, to lease these lands is one, I think, from the present standpoint, inadmissible in the public interest.

In the first place, Mr. President, this is a trust. The Government of the United States does not own these lands. The Government holds these lands in trust for these tribes and their posterity. The Government may become a trustee. It was so held years ago in the Tuckerman case as to the State of Michigan, and it was held that as a trustee the State was bound by the rules which govern trustees generally and differed from no individual trustee, except that being a sovereign it could better administer the trust. As a trustee, Mr. President, no reason could be given why these lands should be sold. They will constantly increase in value. Owned by a great estate they would not be for sale. No better property can be found to hold. They should not be sold, nor should they be unrestrictedly leased at anybody's will.

As the law stands to-day, what restrictions may the Secretary lawfully put in the leases? Whether these lands shall be leased to corporations or whether they shall be leased to one man or another with reference to his connection with corporations is not a question which Congress has committed to any executive official. That is a matter for Congress to provide for by legislation conserving high public policy. The only method by which they should be disposed of is the lease, for the reason that the lease can be controlled, and efficiently controlled. Prohibition upon the assignment of any lease without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior or the approval of the President is entirely within the constitutional capacity of Congress. The reservation of the right to forfeit for breach of any condition of the lease is entirely within the constitutional capacity of Congress, and it may be so framed as to be easily exercised and to afford quick and adequate protection. Nobody except those who are otherwise interested wants this great body of fuel to pass into the hands or under the control of transportation companies.

So I think, if the conferees on the part of the Senate are not satisfied in framing appropriate legislation restricting the lease and safeguarding the public interest as well as the interests of the cestui que trust, they should entirely withhold their agreement from the proposition in any form. It is not easy——

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to ask the Senator if he could, with all his acknowledged skill, frame a provision that would effectually and practically prevent in the last analysis transportation companies from getting hold of the property?

Mr. SPOONER. I am afraid if I say it can be done, the question will be followed up by a request for me to do it. I think it can be done. One thing is very certain. If it can not be done those lands ought neither to be sold nor leased, because the Government is not helpless. The lands are not subject to taxation. The Government is under no pressure to make haste in disposing of these lands; not at all. There is no overwhelming public necessity which calls upon the Congress this year or next winter or for many winters to come to dispose of these lands. No one thinks, I take it, that with the lapse of time the consumption of coal in other parts of the country the lands will diminish in value. Short leases of these lands, with the privilege of renewal under certain restrictions, would go a long way to protect them if the execution and administration were honest and efficient. But, Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. No; the Senator will excuse me. I wish to conclude.

Mr. TILLMAN. I merely wish to give the Senator something along the line he is just discussing.

Mr. SPOONER. I will yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have made a rough calculation, and if the junior Senator from Wisconsin is correct as to the immense amount of coal, and I have no doubt he is, there have been found enough lands to produce 665,000,000 tons of coal, and I do not think there is going to be any dearth of coal around there the next forty years.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not understand the necessity for haste about it. The lands will be there next year and years hence. I think that Congress ought to take its time about this matter, which is very grave and in some respects involves great interests.

But I rose really to call attention to section 19. It is very much as the Senate passed it. But as it is in conference with a house penitentiae, I should like to say a few words about it. I used to know something about the Indians. I saw some things among them that made me think they were devils incarnate, and I saw some things among them that taught me to know that they were human also. They have been treated as wards of the Government. They have been treated during all these years as incapable of managing their own affairs in competition with white men. I think it was a great mistake to make citizens of them. It was not at all necessary, in order to make allotments of land to the Indians and to put each Indian upon a tract of land which he owns, that he should be taken out from the guardianship of the Government at all. The Indian was no more fit to be a citizen of the United States when he had become the owner of a hundred and sixty acres of land than he was before.

The laws under which that was brought about treated the Indian as unable at this day efficiently to protect his property interests, because the allotments and the patents issued upon the allotments contain a restriction upon the power of alienation. You can by law make an Indian a citizen of the United States, but you can not by law change Indian nature. You can not by an act of Congress make a man prudent, thrifty, able to attend successfully to business affairs, to deal on an even plane with the experienced, educated, and rapacious white man. Whether making them citizens operates to remove from the patents which have been issued to them the restrictions upon alienation has not been determined. It could not have been the purpose of Congress. I would not be willing to impute to Congress any such purpose.

But I notice that every time an Indian bill has come into the Senate during the last few years it has contained proposition after proposition, taking pages of the bill, removing the existing restrictions upon the power of alienation. This bill is inconsistent upon that subject. Notwithstanding citizenship, it still assumes the power of guardianship. It will be an unhappy day for the Indians, the members of a vanishing race, if the court shall hold that citizenship destroyed these limitations upon the power of alienation. The Indians will become the prey of the white man everywhere, and it will not be long until relatively few Indians will own the lands which had become theirs under the system of allotment. The Congress ought to legislate upon the basis that citizenship and allotment have made no difference with the Indian nature or with the power of the Government to protect the Indians against their own weaknesses and against spoliation by white men.

I wish to call attention to section 19. It reads:

"That all restrictions upon alienations and leasing of lands of Indians [citizens of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole Nations] of less than full blood are, except as to homesteads, hereby removed."

Why "except as to homesteads?" Why prohibit American citizens, made capable by law of protecting their property interests, of looking after the future of their families, from conveying, with the concurrence of the wife, these homesteads? All citizens have that right in the States as to homesteads.

Mr. TELLER. Not all.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, they do in my State. This reservation of a restriction as to homesteads implies a legislative theory that these people still need the care of the Government, and every Senator here knows that they do.

Mr. BACON. It also involves a recognition of our right to control them.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. I think we have a right to control them.

Mr. CLAPP. That is the reserved right. It does not involve the recognition of our power to control wherein it has ceased to have it. This provision still continues to reserve the power.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Senator is correct. There is a distinction and a very clear distinction. But let us not go beyond the line which this policy, which I think was a mistaken one, has clearly drawn. Certainly I think it must be true that as to those to whom lands were patented with these restrictions prior to becoming citizens the restrictions hold. I am not sure but that it would hold now by the doctrine of estoppel. Where a deed is accepted containing a restriction the grantee might be estopped to repudiate the restriction.

Mr. BACON. As I understand the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], while it is true that that distinction exists, the power of reservation as to the remainder has not been surrendered by us.

Mr. CLAPP. When the Senator gets a little further on he will find that we do attempt in this bill—and the bill passed the Senate in that form—to now reach out and withdraw the grant we previously made of alienation. I wish in this connection to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that a different rule obtains in different reservations. Undoubtedly where the Government is buying the land, and the court has so decided, the Government can attach these restrictions. In the Indian Territory, outside of the reservations in the northeast part of the Territory, this property was the property of the Indian when the several laws were passed. We simply passed laws to distribute what already belonged to us. That might make a difference in our legal attitude, of course.

Mr. SPOONER. What distinction is there as to the power of the Government to create restrictions upon alienation between a half-blood citizen of the United States and a full-blood citizen of the United States?

Mr. CLAPP. There is none as to that, but there is a difference between the working of the doctrine of estoppel where you grant something and the party takes it with that restriction and where you are simply distributing what already might belong to us. That is the point I was making.

Mr. SPOONER. That is true.

Mr. President, why remove the restriction upon alienation and leave a restriction upon the power to lease? What is the theory of that?

Mr. TELLER. There can not be any, I think.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That was fully explained by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] when I asked the question.

Mr. SPOONER. The restrictions ought to be left upon the power of alienation, and the power of leasing ought not necessarily to contain any restriction whatever. That would protect the Indians, if it is within the constitutional capacity of Congress now to do it. Leave the restriction upon the power to alienate. The Indian may make an improvident lease, but the fee still belongs to him, and when the term of the lease shall have expired he has his land and the power to release it if he chooses, or the power to occupy it. But when you remove the restriction from the power to alienate, to convey, you make him the victim of every scoundrel who cares to make him drunk in order, while he is irresponsible, that he may beguile from him his patrimony. That danger does not exist except to a trifling extent in the exercise of the power to lease.

This is plain to me. I can not see any reason, certainly none in the interest of the Indian, that restricts this temporary alienation of land, but permits him without restriction to forever part with the title and dominion. If any change is made in this language, it should be to take out of it the provision which removes restrictions upon alienation and leaves the Indian where he can be despoiled.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Wisconsin was a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SPOONER. What have I done that the Senator should wish that?

Mr. TELLER. Many of us have been considering difficult Indian questions for several weeks in that committee, and if the Senator had been on the committee I do not think he would know any more than he does now about them; and I think he would be ready to admit that he did not know much about it.

Mr. SPOONER. I am ready to admit that now.

Mr. TELLER. It is a problem pretty difficult to solve. There are 90,000 Indians in the Indian Territory. Twenty-four thousand is supposed to be about the number of half-bloods. Then there are all grades from a quarter blood and an eighth to the full white man. There are men and women there who claim to be Indians by descent and who are as white as any member of this body. There are men and women there who are as perfectly competent to take charge of their affairs as anybody here. Yet they are Indians. I do not mean that they are Indians now, but they were Indians under the law.

I made a trip some years ago through the Indian Territory with a committee. We spent a month down there. It has been my fortune to live in the neighborhood of Indians ever since I can remember. When I was a boy living in New York I lived by the side of an Indian reservation. I know something about the Indians, and I know something about their character.

About twenty-five years ago, or a little more, there arose in this country great interest in the Indians, especially amongst people who had never seen an Indian and knew nothing about him. They organized societies for their culture and education. It suddenly struck somebody that really what these Indians needed was a title to a piece of land. The impression went out very strongly, I think, amongst the benevolent people who were really desirous of doing good that all you had to do was to give them a piece of land and civilization would follow.

We had tried that before. Five thousand patents were issued at one time in the State of Michigan, with a limitation of five years. It did not civilize the Indians. It is said that a year after the five years expired there was not a single piece of the large section of country that had been allotted to them and patented to them that was held by an Indian.

I think about four years ago, by a bill called the "Curtis bill," it was supposed that we had really settled the Indian problem. That bill provided that when an Indian took an allotment he then became a citizen of the United States. That was not enough. At a subsequent time we provided that on the 4th of March, 1906, all Indians in the Indian Territory should become citizens of the United States.

So, Mr. President, there we are met with that proposition. These people were our wards and we made a very sorry mess of it in trying to take care of them. Well-intentioned good people have come here repeatedly and sought legislation that was perfectly hostile to the Indian and calculated to destroy him. With the best possible intention they insisted upon and secured such legislation. I said once here years ago that an association of as good people as there was in the country, calling themselves the Indian Association, had done more harm to the Indians than any other class of people I knew anything about. If you should entitle all the legislation that has been passed in twenty-five years by Congress "a bill to destroy the Indian," I think more than half of it would be accredited as an absolutely perfect description not of the purpose but of the effect.

The 24,000 Indians who are now in the Indian Territory are not competent to take care of their own affairs. A considerable number of those who are citizens but are not full blood are not capable, but there are thousands of men there who are capable of taking care of their affairs.

The Committee on Indian Affairs, since I have been a member of it, for about four years, has been anxious to relieve the class of men who were capable of taking care of their own affairs, and so at every session we have put in the bill, on such evidence as we could get, that so and so, naming them—sometimes they were white people, absolutely white, Indians by adoption, surely Indians by intermarriage—might sell their land. We put in a provision that the half bloods might sell, and occasionally we have allowed a full blood to sell when the evidence was positive that he could take care of himself, because there are exceptions. There are full bloods who can do that. You can not draw a line upon the blood. I have known magnificent Indians, Indians of great ability, men, I suppose, representing those Indians in the olden times like Red Jacket and Tecumseh and that class of Indians, who in their native state, without any education, could take care of themselves without any trouble. But they are the exception. All native wild people have an appetite for drink. Everybody knows that.

Mr. TILLMAN. And some civilized.

Mr. TELLER. And some civilized, the Senator says. Very few wild people have any idea of the accumulation of property. They live for to-day; to-morrow takes care of itself, so far as they are concerned, and they will not be prudent. It will take four or five generations, I suppose, to make them prudent. But if anybody will take the pains to go back to the Anglo-Saxon history he will find the same condition existed then. The Anglo-Saxon's lust for land, which you talk about, did not exist in the early history of the Anglo-Saxon race. If it existed at all, it only existed when they made a foray on some other country and wanted somebody else's land, which they held in common for generations, just as the Indian held his in this country.

I know it is heresy to say it, Mr. President, but I am one of those people who have believed for many years that if the doctrine prevailed that the land belonged to the man, and to him only, who occupied it and cultivated it—and that is the Indian law—we would be better off than we are to-day, save and except, perhaps, in our cities where conditions made it necessary in order that vast improvements could be made that there should be a title.

There is in the State of New York an Indian tribe that to-day owns its land in common. I will guarantee to show a well-built house, a well-built barn, a well-conducted farm held by a title that has been in the Indian family for three or four generations; and yet, if the occupant should move out of that house and abandon the barn and the farm, some other Indian would walk in and make just as good title to it as he had when he ceased to occupy it. He may transfer it if he chooses to some of his own people. He may sell any possession. He could make an arrangement that another man should take it and occupy it, but no man could hold it if he did not occupy it and make it useful. There are no broad acres that were not open to every Indian.

That is one of the troubles we have been dealing with down in the Indian Territory. When the white men were let in there, an Indian would take a white man and go out and lay off a piece of ground, 160 acres if he wanted it, or 500 acres if he wanted it, and he would say, "Now, you go and cultivate this land; pay me so much for it; I will give you authority to go on it." And the white man went on the land. One day I said to a distinguished Indian down there, a full-blooded Indian, a man really who would grace this body if he sat in it, "They tell me that you have 130 farms. Is not that more than your share?" He said, "I guess I have got about that number; it may be it is more than my share if the division should take place; but look at these broad acres out here. If any Indian wants land there it is; he has no business to complain because I have got this under cultivation." I declared that his logic was perfect; that I myself could not complain; that it was better the land should be cultivated even by a tenant; and these were white tenants, remember, that we and the Indians together had let in there.

Now, that is the way they hold the land. Take some of the freedmen regarding whom provision is made in this bill? The freedmen were entitled to 40 acres of this Indian land and their descendants were entitled to 40 acres. The bill cuts off their descendants.

Mr. President, you could find down there in the Indian Territory a freedman, a colored man, a former slave, with pieces of land cultivated in an excellent shape, in some sections as high as 300 or 400 acres. The freedmen had to give that up and take 40 acres for himself and his wife and children. The children born since that distribution, however, get nothing whatever. That is one of the things they are complaining of here. As stated, they took their lands, I think, six or eight years ago. I do not remember just when. These were not Indians. They were colored citizens of the United States. I repeat, and this is what makes the trouble with me to-day, these Indians down there who, as the Senator says, are not fit to be turned loose, and we must still continue our guardianship over them, are citizens of the United States. Some of them have been citizens for four or five years. I should like any constitutional lawyer to tell me where the authority comes to Congress to touch the property of a citizen of the United States. If he has taken his deed with a limitation, as the Senator says, there may be a doctrine of estoppel; he may be compelled to hold it until the restriction expires.

We were met with this question. We knew that the limitations were not long enough (everybody knows that who knows anything about it) if you mean to hold the land in the Indian possession. When they had become citizens of the United States, when they had taken their lands with a restriction in the deed, could we extend that limitation in the deed and say, "Your deed or patent says you shall hold this land without sale for five years; we add five years more to it?"

Some of the members of our committee would like to have done that. I voted for it last year in committee upon the theory that these men were the wards of the Government. I was ignorant when I first went on that committee that the Curtis Act had made citizens of these people. When it was stated to me then that they were citizens of the United States I said, "You can not increase that limitation or restriction;" and I defy anybody who knows any law at all to assert the contrary.

Now, there are 90,000 citizens of the United States there, and the trouble is they are without educational facilities. They are there as they never were even when they had their tribal relations and were running their council. They are worse off to-day. While nominally to-day the tribal relation exists, the question is presented, "How are you going to maintain a tribe of Indians when they are citizens of the United States?" It is a mere fiction that there is a tribe there. It has ceased actually. While in law it may be useful to hold that they are a tribe in order that the lands may not be taken from them or appropriated by a railroad company that claims a grant, still when you come to deal with them, Mr. President, you are without the power.

We could do something for these Indians if we wanted. We could provide for schools or we could incorporate that section of the Indian Territory into a State, and it might be done in an hour, if we were not charged here with the encumbrance of attaching that new State to two Territories that do not want to be admitted, and there are many members of the Senate say they ought not to be admitted either as one State or as two.

If the Territory of Oklahoma had been off the bill, if it had passed through the House without that encumbrance and the Indian Territory had been provided for last year, it would have been a State now and all the appliances of a State could have been used for the education of the Indians and the white men who are in the Indian Territory, who are absolutely without educational facilities. There is a necessity that we would do something. There is a greater necessity that we should do somethere.

The only way to settle this difficulty, in my judgment, is to make a State of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory. It is true that we have got to do it by a violation of all the treaties that have ever made with those Indians, but, Mr. President, treaties are not so sacred but that they may be undone after they cease to be of value. They have ceased to be of any value to the Indians now, and it is our duty, in my opinion, notwithstanding the obligation we took upon ourselves to see that these Indians should never be incorporated into a State, to declare that they shall be incorporated into a State, that they shall become citizens of that State, and that they shall have the benefits that will flow from statehood.

If the Indian Territory can not be made into a State, then it will be incumbent upon us to provide some method of taking care alike of the Indian children and the white children there. I do not recognize any greater obligation on us to take care of the Indian children than of the white children in the Indian Territory. It is not a State. It belongs to the General Government. We can legislate for it. There are 700,000 white men there with families and no schools. I will venture to say that the chances are decidedly now that there will not be a State made of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory. There will not be unless the Senate shall recede from the action we took here when we declared that the admission of the two Territories as one State should not be a necessary part of the admission of Oklahoma and Indian Territory.

Mr. SPOONER. That comes from an omnibus bill.

Mr. TELLER. That comes, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, from an omnibus bill. Mr. President, I do not remember any other omnibus bill upon statehood since I have been in the Senate, and seven States have been admitted since I have been a member of this body.

I say that if Oklahoma had come here alone, there would not have been five votes against its admission as a State; and Oklahoma would have come here alone if it had not been believed by certain parties in a certain place that by the attachment of Arizona and New Mexico, in our desire to admit Oklahoma, they could force the admission of those two Territories as one State.

I perhaps have spoken with some warmth upon this subject, but the condition in the Indian Territory is absolutely disgraceful to this nation, and unless we are imbeciles we ought to take hold of it and put it to rights. It can be done now, in my opinion, in only one way. If we have made a mistake, as the Senator from Wisconsin has said we did—and I declare that I believe we did, Mr. President—it is too late to undo that. There is not any law and there is not any power under the Constitution to say to a man who is a citizen that he shall not be any longer a citizen. Whether fit or unfit for citizenship, citizenship lasts so long as he lives, unless he chooses to renounce it. He alone can deprive himself of the privileges and rid himself of the incumbrances which citizenship brings.

It is utterly impossible to so frame this bill that it will be fair to the Indians and fair to the white men in the Indian Territory. Somebody will be hurt; and it is not much worse to hurt 90,000 Indians than it is to hurt seven or eight hundred thousand white people down there, who are suffering as much, if not more, than the Indians.

Mr. President, so far as the sale of these coal lands is concerned, the money that comes from the sale will belong to the Indians. I myself was at first in favor of selling those lands; but after looking carefully into the matter, I made up my mind that we had better not sell them now, but wait for a time when better prices will be secured for them.

I do not know whether or not combinations have been made to secure those lands at a small price, but I do know that a great property like that can not be put upon the market in a few months or in a year and bring its full value. Those lands are, as the Senator from Wisconsin, sitting on the other side [Mr. SPOONER], has said, of immense value. They are the most valuable coal fields in the United States, with but few exceptions, and they are in a section of country where coal is needed, where there is now a market for it and will be for many years to come.

Now, Mr. President, if we have improvidently made citizens of the Indians, nevertheless we can not afford to cheat them out of that which belongs to them by their former relation to their tribes. We should keep a careful eye over them, which I believe the Supreme Court has indicated we may still do, by looking after and providing for these lands, even if their beneficiaries are citizens of the United States.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to discuss this matter further, but if there is a disposition to adjourn, I will yield to a motion for adjournment, and postpone my remarks until to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I was merely going to move an executive session.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator withhold that motion for a moment, in order that I may make an inquiry?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I inquire what is the status as to the conference report? Has it been withdrawn?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Minnesota to have withdrawn the conference report?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I had intended to do so, but the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] has raised a question regarding it, which he desires to bring up to-morrow, and so I will let the report lie on the table until then.

Mr. HALE. Do I understand it is the intention of the Senator from Minnesota to call up the conference report the first thing in the morning after the routine business?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; I shall endeavor to do that.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 29, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 28, 1906.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 28, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

HAZING AT THE NAVAL ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 3899) granting authority to the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to dismiss midshipmen from the United States Naval Academy, and regulating the procedure and punishment in trials for hazing at said academy, with House amendments thereto disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its amendments to this bill and agree to a conference.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. VREELAND, Mr. LOUD, and Mr. PADGETT.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submits a report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution of the House No. 383, have had the same under consideration and respectfully report in lieu thereof the following:

Resolved, That hereafter, in consideration of the bill (H. R. 16172) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government, and for other purposes, in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, it shall be in order to consider, without intervention of a point of order, any section of the bill as reported, except section 8; and upon motion authorized by the Committee on Appropriations it shall be in order to insert in any part of the bill any provision reported as part of the bill and heretofore ruled out on a point of order.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask the previous question.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have some explanation in regard to this rule. It seems to be a very extraordinary departure from the general rules of the House.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not wish to discuss the rule until after the previous question is ordered, because any debate before the ordering of the previous question would cut off all debate thereafter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves the previous question upon agreeing to the resolution.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. DALZELL) there were—ayes 120, noes 71.

Accordingly the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to twenty minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy but a very brief time in explanation of the rule.

The House is familiar with the fact that in the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole a great many paragraphs have been stricken out by reason of an

to the rule of the House which prevents legislation on appropriation bills. The trouble has been mainly with respect to number of employees provided for in the bill and with respect to the salaries of employees. The point of order has been made that employees not provided for by existing law are provided in the bill and that salaries not provided for by existing law are included in the bill; and it is fair to say that it seems to me that in all cases the point of order has been well taken.

The difficulty with which the House is confronted arises out of the fact that the law fixing the number of employees and the salaries of employees in the various Departments is in many cases an old law, in some cases as old as thirty years, and of course, during the passage of those thirty years the business of the Government has largely increased, the necessity for new employees has arisen, and the necessity for changes in salary has arisen. Those changes ought to have been made by general law. The fault lies not wholly with the Committee on Appropriations, but largely with the various committees of the House, who ought to have secured the passage of general laws which would authorize the Committee on Appropriations to insert these provisions in the appropriation bill. A custom, however, has grown up during all these years not to make points of order upon items in the appropriation bill which were recognized by the House as appropriate under the circumstances, and the custom therefore has justified the Committee on Appropriations from year to year in putting into the appropriation bill these increases of salary and these increases of appropriation. As I say, the fault lies with the committees of the House, who ought to have provided general legislation. In illustration of that proposition, let me call your attention to what appears on two pages of the RECORD. An appropriation in this bill for the employees at New Orleans went out on a point of order because it infringed a provision of existing law on the subject. That provision was over thirty years old; nevertheless, during all these thirty years since its enactment, without any additional legislation, appropriations corresponding to this have been made by the sufferance of the House.

Now, on the opposite page of the RECORD, you will find a like appropriation for employees at New York, but that did not go out on a point of order, because there appears on the statute book this provision:

The assistant treasurer at New York may appoint from time to time, by and with the consent and approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury, such other clerks, messengers, and watchmen, in addition to those employed by him, as the exigencies of the business may require.

In other words, we ought to have, to avoid the confusion into which we have fallen in this case, such general legislation upon the statute books. It is apparent, however, that the House can not now stop the business of the country can not be held up, because of the lack of this general legislation. The Government needs must be met, and therefore the only way in which the present needs of the Government can be met is by the adoption of this rule.

The rule provides that these items which have already gone out on points of order may be inserted at the will of the House. In other words, it submits to the House the right to say whether or not upon the merits the items shall go into the bill. The rule also provides that, as to the items not yet reached, they shall be passed upon on their merits irrespective of the technical rule; all except section 8, which relates to superannuated clerks, so called. Your committee felt that that was a piece of legislation that was entitled to be considered by the House as a separate proposition, and therefore that is excepted from the operation of the rule.

Mr. CURTIS. Under the rule that section would be subject to a point of order?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. I think that provision unfair to the clerks who have devoted many years to the service, many of whom were Union soldiers, and it should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The rule does not make anything in order that may be offered to be inserted by a Member?

Mr. DALZELL. No; it does not make anything in order except what was reported by the Appropriations Committee and an amendment to it which would be germane.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does not the gentleman think that the Members of the House ought to be allowed to offer amendments to be considered on their merits?

Mr. DALZELL. They will have that privilege.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If subject to a point of order, they would go out.

Mr. DALZELL. They would go out anyway.

Mr. MANN. Under this rule the amendment which the Committee on Appropriations offers—that is, to increase the salaries—is in order.

Mr. DALZELL. If it is in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Whether it is in the bill or not, if the committee reports it it is in order.

Mr. DALZELL. Only as reported in the bill.

Mr. MANN. In that case, then, the amendments offered by any Member of the House to increase that amount would necessarily be in order.

Mr. DALZELL. But subject to a legitimate point of order, of course.

Mr. MANN. If the proposition offered by the Committee on Appropriations is in order, an amendment to that proposition is also in order.

Mr. DALZELL. I should say so.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if the Committee on Appropriations puts in the bill an appropriation for a salary, for instance, greater than that allowed by existing law, it would not be subject to a point of order; but if a Member on the floor of the House offers an amendment that increases the salary in the bill greater than that allowed by existing law, that would be subject to a point of order?

Mr. DALZELL. Not if the amendment was to a paragraph in the bill that under the rule was not subject to a point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. So that the gentleman may understand my proposition, suppose it makes an appropriation for a salary that is in exact accordance with existing law, and a Member on the floor of the House offers an amendment to increase it beyond that limit, would that be in order?

Mr. DALZELL. I should think not; I should think it would be subject to a point of order. If the committee's proposition was in accordance with the law, and the amendment not in accordance with the law, I should think it would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. In other words, the committee can propose amendments that go beyond existing law, but Members of the House can not. This privilege exists only in favor of the committee. In other words, it is a rule that does not work both ways.

Mr. DALZELL. Not at all. It is a rule that allows the bill as reported by the Committee on Appropriations to be considered without being subject to points of order, except as to section 8. That is all it is.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It is to be considered on its merits.

Mr. DALZELL. In other words, it submits to the House the bill as reported by the Committee on Appropriations on its merits. The committee may vote on each proposition without respect to points of order upon the merits of the proposition.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, to be more specific on the question asked by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], then if the committee has reported an item which is entirely legal, or an amendment, and the House by amendment attempts to change that in any way, that proposition is open to a point of order.

Mr. DALZELL. Not unless it is against the law.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. In any way, so that it transgresses the rules.

Mr. DALZELL. For instance, if there is an amount named in the bill, that is subject to amendment.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. One further question. Then if the committee has reported an item which if objected to would go out on a point of order, that item may be further amended also in the direction that would have been, without the rule, open to a point of order.

Mr. DALZELL. I think so; yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Did the Committee on Rules proceed upon the theory that the Committee on Appropriations was unanimously in favor of having considered in this way all of the legislative provisions excepting section 8?

Mr. DALZELL. I do not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Did the Committee on Rules proceed upon the assumption that the Committee on Appropriations was unanimous in desiring to have all of the legislative provisions considered in this way excepting section 8?

Mr. DALZELL. Why, we did not think anything about what the Committee on Appropriations wanted especially.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman did, because his rule provides that all the things reported in the bill by the Committee on Appropriations shall be considered regardless of the rules, excepting section 8. Now, there are several other distinctively legislative provisions in the bill not excepted by the rule, but to which there was objection in the committee, about which notice was given that points of order would be interposed and which this rule takes out of the operation of the rules of the House. I would ask the gentleman to explain why the Committee on Rules singled out one legislative provision and not other legislative provisions equally offensive?

Mr. DALZELL. Because we thought that that one legislative provision was so radical in its character, so much more radical than any of the others, that it ought to have separate consideration in the ordinary way.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. How much more time have I?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. DALZELL. Then, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. I can not yield any more.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the object of this rule is to make points of order which are not in order under the rules of the House out of order under this rule. It is an apt illustration and object lesson, indeed, of the defectiveness of the rules of the House. I shall not consume the time of the committee by arguing that question. Others want to be heard, and I shall yield to them. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question before he sits down?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to consume any time if I can help it. I desire to yield to others.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, the whole trouble that the House is now in is due to paragraph 2 of Rule XXI of the House of Representatives, which is as follows:

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who has just taken his seat, says the points of order have been well taken. So much for the obstructionists. The points of order have been well taken. Now, what does the chairman of the committee say? On page 4281 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 23, 1906, Mr. TAWNEY says:

> If this rule is to be enforced, then more than one-half of the provisions of this bill will have to go out.

Properly taken! More than one-half of it is to go out! What is the rule? "No appropriation shall be reported"—confessedly in order are these supposed obstructionists. "The points of order are well taken," says the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The chairman of the committee says that half of it will go out. Why did he knowingly, willfully, deliberately, and flagrantly violate the rules of this House to bring in a bill of which he himself says one-half would go out on points of order if they were made? Now, then, let us turn to the effect of the rule. Here is a rule that applies to one Committee on Appropriations. How many appropriation bills are there, gentlemen of the House?

Look at your Calendar of date March 26, 1906, and you find the following: Urgent deficiency; pensions; fortifications; Army; Indian; legislative, executive, and judicial; Post-Office; agricultural; diplomatic and consular; District of Columbia; general deficiency; Military Academy; naval; public buildings; rivers and harbors, and sundry civil appropriation bills—sixteen appropriation bills in this House. If this provision is good for one committee, why is it not good for every committee that passes appropriation bills in this House? [Applause.] Will you tell me? I say now, and wait for answer, if the Committee on Rules will make this special a general rule that will apply to every appropriation committee of this House I will vote for the rule now. Will you do it? What answer have you to make to these other committees that you single out one as against ten others?

What is your reply for doing it when you confessedly admit your bill is out of order, when you confessedly admit every point of order that has been made against the bill is in order and under the rules of this House? Now, who have passed upon the objections? Two honorable Members of this House, none higher in the estimation of this body than those two, sitting day in and day out in the chair as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] held time after time that practically every one of those points of order are in order, and the provisions had to go out. They changed hands for a few minutes, and the distinguished Member from New York [Mr. PAYNE] took the chair, and he held likewise upon these very same provisions. Where is the obstruction? Now, gentlemen of the House, let me say this to you, that we all are here as Members. You have heard me ask the Committee on Rules if they will make this rule a general rule to apply to your committees on which you are serving and the committees on which I am serving. They have not said they would do it. What will you say to your constituents? Will you vote for a special rule which allows the increases of salaries, changes existing law, and enacts new and original legislation? What will you say to the committees of which you are members, over which have presided for more than a hundred years some of the most distinguished men who have sat in this body——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PRINCE. I ask leave to extend my remarks if I so desire.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who are not opposed to suitable legislation upon an appropriation bill. I am opposed, however, to this way of getting at that legislation. It would be very easy, as matters now stand, to have every item in this appropriation bill considered by the committee and by the House. Of course, when the point of order is made it is the duty of the presiding officer to rule upon that point of order, under the rules. A point of order against new legislation on a bill like this is a good point, and, under the rules, the presiding officer has to sustain it. Now, when the point of order is sustained, if there be real occasion for the legislation proposed, what is the reason that the chairman of the subcommittee on appropriations, or the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, or any other gentleman favoring the proposed legislation, should not frankly admit that the proposition is obnoxious to the rules, but that, owing to its merits, owing to the necessity for legislation at the time and of the kind proposed, the rule as to that item ought to be set aside and the particular matter proposed ought to be enacted into law? Upon that proposition, with a majority of those present sustaining it, the item would remain in or go into the bill. Now, that is a very much safer and a very much better way of proceeding than by a wholesale rule, an omnibus rule. While undoubtedly there are good provisions offered in this bill which are not in accord with existing law, it probably is not saying too much to say that there are also bad provisions offered, also not in accordance with existing law. In the case of a good provision, a necessary provision, upon appeal to the House it is reasonable to believe that the House would sustain the appeal, and would enact the good provision—would put it into the bill or retain it in the bill.

Every provision offered in the way of new law, everything obnoxious to the rules of the House, is protected and covered by this rule; everything suggested by the Committee on Appropriations and incorporated in the bill, including those items that were opposed and knocked out—all are legitimized. Provisions already eliminated are to be brought forward, and no point of order shall be tolerated against any of them or against anything in the bill except section 8, when, no matter how meritorious a proposition offered from the floor may be, the rules may be invoked against it; and if it be a change of existing law, or a proposed change of existing law, it must be denied consideration.

This rule is neither in the interest of good legislation, nor is it fair. Allow the rules to stand, if you will; you made them, made them without consideration, without giving opportunity for any particular consideration. When you see proper to set aside one of them, or any order of this House with reference to any particular piece of legislation, appeal direct to the judgment of the House, and if the judgment of the House sustains you the rules will be waived for the time being, and the meritorious piece of legislation will be incorporated in the bill; and let that apply not only to the Committee on Appropriations—that one committee to be singled out for favor over all other committees—but let it apply to all the other committees, and let it apply also to the entire membership of the House. Whenever a proposition is offered from anywhere and ruled out as new legislation, if the proponent of it, or anybody else, sees proper to ask the judgment of the House upon this proposition, and

If the majority see proper to incorporate it, let the rules be read and there set aside as to that matter, and let it be incorporated. There is neither necessity for nor propriety in this rule; it is dangerous in its tendency, and will be bad in its effect. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to consume some of his time.

Mr. DALZELL. I propose to close on this side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has seven minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi ten minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly apparent that one of two things is true. Either the bill is wrong or the rule is wrong. If the rule is wrong, this bill ought to pass, and the rule ought to be repealed; and if the rule is wrong, then the rule ought to be repealed, so that any bill can pass.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that there has ever been in the legislative history of the country such a measure proposed as that contained in this rule. I want to make the statement here in my place that never before in the history of the American Congress has such a proposition been made to any House of Representatives as that contained in this rule. There are two or three precedents in which the Committee on Rules have taken some one single proposition and passed a rule to make a matter in order when a point of order would lie against it and had been urged against it. In the second session of the Fifty-second Congress such a provision was made by the Committee on Rules on one single proposition, namely, the creation of a commission to investigate the various Executive Departments of the Government. In the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress we had another rule from the committee, authorizing the committee to consider an increase in the salary of the rural carriers, and we had the same proposition at the second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress on a bill providing for the levying of a personal tax in the District of Columbia. Each one of these propositions was segregated and distinct, and the House of Representatives understood what it was voting for. Now, in this proposition, by this omnibus rule, we are offered what? To make everything in order, involving forty-seven separate paragraphs, involving a general increase of appropriations; thirty-eight separate paragraphs, involving different amounts of increase of salary; in other words, in my humble judgment—and I have investigated it to some extent—you are proposing by this rule to legalize about seven hundred things that would not be legal if this rule did not pass.

No member of the Committee on Rules and no Member of this House who votes for this rule will know what on earth he is voting for. Now, if we are going to let the Committee on Appropriations have certain special rights to pass any legislation as riders on appropriation bills—new legislation—let us have the same rights for everybody. Why should we not? I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that during the progress of the consideration of the pending bill, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] arose and asked that the House be allowed to vote on a simple proposition, viz, that the internal-revenue offices of the Government should be required to furnish certified copies of their records to any court, State or Federal, to be used as evidence, as to what licenses had been taken out for the sale of liquor. That proposition had been recommended by the unanimous vote of just as strong a committee as the Appropriations Committee, to wit, the Ways and Means Committee; and yet the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], in charge of this bill, made the point of order against that and insisted upon it. Now, I say this is not fair. There are good reasons why riders putting new legislation on appropriation bills ought not to be allowed. Under the rules of the House 100 Members constitute a quorum in Committee of the Whole, and fifty-one Members may, if this sort of thing be kept up, enact all sorts of legislation. Indeed, I have seen thirty-six members of the Committee of the Whole decide a question, less even than a quorum of the committee. But even if the rules as to a quorum are invoked, fifty-one Members—less than one-seventh of the membership of the House—can decide a question in committee. There are good reasons back of Rule XXI and it ought to be enforced. I understand the Senate has no such rule, and it may be that when these propositions are meritorious they will be restored in the Senate. With that I am not concerned; but I say that our general rule is a good one and it ought to be enforced, and that it ought not to be varied simply because certain gentlemen want to pass legislation to suit themselves, or because a certain committee wants to do about seven hundred things that the law will not allow them to do, in their own way. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, this is a very extraordinary method of attempting to pass a very ordinary bill. A measure similar to this, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government, is passed every year without any unusual friction and without appealing to the Committee on Rules for assistance. This bill was debated during several days, and when the reading was commenced under the five-minute rule the Committee on Appropriations found itself in trouble. Subdivision 2 of Rule XXI of the Rules of the House of Representatives is as follows:

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

A few Members of this House on both sides of the Chamber examined the bill with considerable care and they found that this rule of the House was violated in almost every section; that many appropriations of small and large amounts were reported in the bill which were not previously authorized by law, and that there were in it several provisions changing existing law. These were all obnoxious to the rule and liable to be stricken out on points of order. The gentlemen who examined the statutes and this bill commenced to raise these points of order against increases of salaries and clerks and other provisions increasing expenditure, and also against the new provisions changing existing law. In my judgment, those gentlemen who have given much time and attention to this matter and have sat here day after day insisting that the rule be observed have been rendering a signal service, not only to the other Members of this House, but to the country. For their courage or temerity, if we may so describe it, they are entitled to great credit, because there is altogether too much of "you tickle me and I'll tickle you" in this appropriation business. That is why the expenditures increase from year to year, and it is practically impossible to keep them down. Not every Member, especially if there is in the appropriation bill some benefit for his district or constituents, wishes to object to any other appropriation, no matter how extravagant or unreasonable. Therefore these gentlemen are entitled to the thanks of the country for their courageous and unselfish action in behalf of the Treasury.

After a few objections of this character were made the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, in an able and vigorous speech, undertook to criticise and censure those gentlemen for objecting, and attempted to arouse public sentiment in the House against them. In this he failed, for they continued to raise points of order, which were sustained by the Chair. The gentleman from New York, who has charge of this bill, undertook to lash one of the objectors—the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE]—into silence by twitting him about a little crumb of patronage in the form of a janitorship. This did not avail, and later on another member of the Appropriations Committee took the floor, raised the white flag of truce, and, in a most conciliatory address, sued for peace; and that failed to accomplish the object desired. Now, these gentlemen throw up their hands and surrender at discretion, and acknowledge that they can not pass an ordinary appropriations bill under the ordinary rule which has obtained for many years, and have applied to the all powerful Committee on Rules for a special rule or resolution giving them extraordinary powers and privileges. Why? Is it claimed that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House who presides during the consideration of this bill is unfair or partial? He has had before him the book of rules, and has ably and honestly applied them to each point of order raised; and a gentleman stands at his elbow who writes and revises the book, and who the Speaker said could give any man on the floor of the House cards and spades and beat him in parliamentary law. Now, what is the trouble? The gentlemen in charge of this bill do not assert that they have not received fair treatment in the consideration and application of the rule, and admit that a very large part of this appropriation bill will have to be stricken out if the rule be insisted on. The conclusion is forced on every Member of this House that the rule is a very bad one, or the bill is a very bad one. If the rule is insufficient and antiquated, let it be amended or repealed. If the rule is a good one, let it be applied. If the bill is an extravagant one, let it be trimmed down to come within the limitations of the law.

That is the best way to determine whether it is a good or bad measure. And the best way to determine whether a rule or law is good or bad is by its enforcement. Let the law be applied. Let the rule be enforced. Let the balance of this bill be read, and let the gentlemen who are raising points of order continue to do so and hew to the line and let the chips fall where they may. When it is concluded the country at large will be informed how much of this bill is in violation of law, how much of it represents extravagance, and how much of it is padded, and the Members of this body will be enlightened as to the wisdom of maintaining the rule.

In ordinary proceedings in this House this rule is invoked more perhaps than any other, and we have from time to time been told that for the proper discharge of business and for the sake of economy and wise legislation, it is necessary and should be maintained in its full force and vigor. If any Member of the House suggested to the Appropriations Committee that the number of clerks in a bureau be increased or the salary of any employee be advanced, and it did not suit them, he was told very politely that it was unauthorized by existing law and would be stricken out on a point of order, and he subsided gracefully in deference to the rule. These gentlemen, who have disposed of so many applications by invoking the rule, should be the last to seek relief from the force of its application. They should be willing to take their own medicine.

There are perhaps fifteen other committees of this House who bring in appropriation bills and are expected to have them enacted into law. Why should this rule be suspended as to this committee and this appropriation bill and enforced as to all others? If a good rule, why should it not be enforced as to all? If a bad rule, why should it not be suspended as to all?

There are 386 Members of this House, and only 17 of them are on the Appropriations Committee. Under this special resolution or rule sought to be adopted here no further points of order can be raised. No objections can be made no matter how many appropriations there are in it which are unauthorized by existing law. Thus the Appropriations Committee will be permitted to submit to the consideration of the House all amendments they have inserted in the bill which will increase salaries and employees, while if any other Member offers an amendment for the same purpose it will be ruled out on a point of order. If you insist on suspending this rule in its application to the Appropriations Committee, why not suspend it in its application to all the Members and let each of them have the same privilege of offering amendments whether within the provisions of existing law or not? Why should not each Member have the privilege and opportunity of offering an amendment and having it considered on the merits without being ruled out on a point of order, which privilege and opportunity will be accorded the Appropriations Committee under this proposed resolution? The ordinary Member of the House is sufficiently hampered and circumscribed already. Many of you have been complaining and wincing under the application of the rules in force. If you adopt this resolution, you will surrender one of the prerogatives vouchsafed you. You will tie yourselves hand and foot and deliver yourselves bound and gagged into the power of the Appropriations Committee. So far as practical results go, you may as well go home and send so many wooden Indians in your places. [Applause.]

This proposed legislation should not be adopted. We should stand by the rule in force, which seems to have served its purpose pretty well in the past and avoided much unnecessary extravagance. This seems to be a "stand-pat" Congress. Only yesterday the distinguished gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in a very able and eloquent address, notified the Members of this House and the whole country that there will be no revision of the tariff schedules; that this House will stand pat. For the sake of consistency, for the sake of economy in the public service, and for the protection of our own rights and dignity as individual Members of this body let us "stand pat" on the existing rule and reject this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield the two remaining minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, while I have no sympathy with the action of the gentlemen who have been taking matters out of the legislative bill without regard to their merits, yet I do not favor this rule. It is more sweeping in its character than I have been able to find in a search of the precedents. It makes it possible to keep in this bill indefensible increases of salary for favorites of some men in this House, while those who are without influence are ignored entirely. The committee, indeed, might be said to have been tyrannical in reporting this bill, because, in defiance of the rules, points of order submitted in committee were ignored, although the rules of the House are binding there, and matters that should not be in the bill are in it and are going to be continued in it under this rule. There are other legislative provisions equally indefensible, equally offensive, equally as important for separate consideration as section 8; and yet the Committee on Rules, without knowing what is in the bill, includes the good with the bad and compels the House to consider on this bill provisions with which few of the Members are familiar.

If this rule was framed so that these matters of importance—the matters that had real merit—would be considered in this way, I would gladly support this rule, but unless this rule is so framed that other committees with appropriating powers are permitted to report legislation and have it considered, the exception should not be made in this case.

This rule—Rule XXI, under which the points of order have been made—is of great importance and value, having originated in 1837, or else it is absolutely worthless. If it is worthless, it should be modified to meet the changed conditions. In my judgment, the action of these two gentlemen, of which complaint is made, while it has done great harm in some instances, yet they have effected considerable good in the position they have taken during the past few days. It would be an extraordinary thing to permit the Committee on Appropriations, of which I happen to be a member, to say that increases of salaries for certain persons should be considered in order on the legislative bill while increases for other men who have no friends could not be considered. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the rule of the House which has been so often invoked by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] is an old and time-honored rule of the House. It was not made by a Republican House; it originated in a Democratic House. I found it in active operation when I came here twenty years ago, and it has been pretty effectually enforced ever since. On the present occasion I wish first to state, so that the Members of the House will not be misled, that the proposed rule operates upon provisions subject to a point of order made against them in the pending bill in this way: In the first place, it leaves exactly where we find it all that part of the bill which relates to aged or superannuated clerks that has gone out of the bill, and it is not proposed to put it back into the bill by the operation of this rule.

Mr. KEIFER. That provision has not yet gone out.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It has gone out under the rules as effectually as if it had never been put in. The various rulings of the Chair have that effect. Now, what next? The next operation is to make it in order that the other provisions of the bill, to which exceptions have been taken and which have been sustained by the Chairman, will still be in order, but subject to the action of the House upon each one of these provisions separately. So that a majority of the Committee of the Whole House can either adopt one of these provisions, or amend one of these provisions, or reject it altogether. It simply affords the House the full opportunity to pass upon every one of these objectionable provisions.

Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Appropriations, after very careful study, apparently—and I think I may safely say so—have brought here a provision that looks to me, and, I think, looks to gentlemen even on the other side, as a proposition of great improvement, as it will completely reorganize certain of the clerical forces of the various Departments here. It is true it comes here without the sanction of the rule of the House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] seems to take it for granted that to bring a bill into the House with a paragraph or section in it obnoxious to the rule of the House is a sort of parliamentary crime, a crime for which the Committee on Appropriations ought to be indicted. Why, I have never known of an appropriation bill of any considerable length that did not have some provision in it that was held by the Chairman to be obnoxious to the rule that has been invoked here against provisions of the pending bill.

Mr. Speaker, here is what we have got to meet: We must abandon our proposition of reform and improvement and send a bill to the Senate that would be disgraceful to the House of Representatives—a bill that does not and would not provide for any considerable completeness in the appropriations—or else, having ascertained what ought to be done, we temporarily set aside this rule for the purpose of doing exactly what the House of Representatives will decide ought to be done. It is not a revolutionary proposition; it is a proposition looking to the action of the House itself, an action which they may just as well take in this form as to take it in some other form. How can you get this proposition before the House anywhere else during this session of Congress than in an appropriation bill and in this appropriation bill?

There is a large number of appropriations for salaries of clerks employed in the various bureaus of the Government that have gone out of the bill under the ruling of the Chair, which was a proper ruling and had to be made. Now, shall we stumble about here and act unwisely an inconsiderately, or shall we take up these amendments one by one and act wisely and judiciously and in keeping with a rule of the House that is higher than a written rule in the books? Gentlemen seem to think that this action in the House is in some way or other revolutionary. It is just as exactly and as completely in order and just as proper as it would be to create a new rule. Gentlemen say, "Send the rule back to the Committee on Rules and let them make a new rule." That is no more in consonance with good judgment and wise legislation than will be the correction of the difficulty by this action, this temporary action, upon this particular appropriation bill. Mr. Speaker, this is the shortest and best way to give to the House a fair opportunity to be heard upon every one of these propositions and to act intelligently and wisely. Therefore I think that gentlemen who have delayed this bill all these days ought not now to appeal to the House to destroy the bill and compel it to go back to the Committee on Appropriations to have a new investigation and a new bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 169, nays 109, answered "present" 12, not voting 92, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

In response to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th of March, 1906, I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, accompanied by a report made by Herbert H. D. Peirce, Third Assistant Secretary of State, of the result of his inspection of the consulates of the United States in the Orient.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 28, 1906.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. LITTAUER, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose last night the item that was under consideration was the item on page 69 of the bill, and an amendment that was offered thereto, under which the item——

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 7 and 8, page 69, strike out the word "seventy-five" and insert "one hundred and fifty" in lieu thereof.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, speaking to that amendment, I desire to call the committee's attention briefly to the amount proposed in the bill before the committee, the estimates of the Director, and the appropriation for this item in the bill of last year. Last year that item was carried at $115,000. That was based upon the Director's estimate before the mint had actually started and upon the most careful data then obtainable. In the estimates of the Director for this year the item is carried at $150,000, and the committee in its wisdom cut it in two and made it $75,000. The item in this bill for this year for expenses of workmen and employees is only $75,000, and that is for a mint with an employee force of over a hundred men on its rolls, exclusive of the executive force of the mint. Now, gentlemen of the committee, we do not for a moment think or suggest that there could be any possible discrimination at the hands of this great committee against this institution, although this appropriation is reduced just exactly 50 per cent. On the other hand, we think that the action of the committee must have been based upon a very serious and absolute misconception of the facts as they exist. Now, it is true and we admit that of the appropriation for last year when the committee made this estimate only about $40,000 had been expended, but it is also true that on the 1st of July, according to the statement of the Acting Director, there will be only $40,000 left of the $115,000, and that, on the assumption of operations for a full year, because the new mint will have been running on July 1 only about five months, would mean an expenditure of about $118,000. Now, that is not exactly correct, because, of course, before the mint started coining there was a considerable amount of expenditure for workmen and labor, which was properly chargeable to this fund, but it is true that the rate of expenditure to-day demands and warrants an appropriation even larger than $150,000.

Now, we understand it is possible that an excuse for this reduction may be sought to be made because the mint has not been running the full year, because it was not in operation last summer, and that it has only been running for a matter of five months. Well, that is very easily explained. The present coiner was appointed April, 1905. He was appointed under the statement of the Director to the Treasury officials that the mint would begin operations on July 1, 1905, and that statement and that belief was then warranted. The mint machinery was made in 1904, and was a part of the Government exhibit at St. Louis in that year. It was taken to Denver in the winter of 1904 and 1905, and that was about the time when the coiner was appointed and the executive force installed. Now, when the coining machinery was put in it was found there was an error in the contract work, and through the fault of the contractors the concrete that was laid on the floor of the press room had to be relaid and part had to be relaid a second time. The result of that was that not until December, 1905, could the operations of the mint be started at all except in the assay rooms and in the rooms of the melter and refiner, which of course run all the time.

The force for the melter and refiner and for the assayer was employed and was started to work about the time the new mint was occupied, in September or October, 1904, and that work has been going on all the time thereafter. Now, I am advised by the Director, and I want the committee to bear this fact in mind, that if the proposed appropriation is carried in this bill, the present force of men can not be carried for more than six months. In other words, gentlemen, if you cut us down to $75,000 you will stop the Denver mint on the 1st of January, 1907. I do not believe this committee intends to do that thing. I do not believe that it intends to cripple this institution in that way. The only explanation is that you have not understood, and do not understand what the result will be.

Now, there is no consideration of economy in the matter. The committee should understand what the results will be upon the working force. Every new man employed in the institution must be taken from the civil service. These employees have fitted themselves for this work, many of them with the intention of making it a life work, and they will have been at work on the 1st of July only about five months, less than a year in January, 1907; and when they are dismissed, as they must be, they will be forced to go back to other means of livelihood. Many of them will then be unable to get other positions, and there will be great hardship entailed—a hardship that is unwarranted, unnecessary, and unjust. There is, as I say, no possible consideration of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I ask unanimous consent for a few minutes more, so that I may explain the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. There is no possible economy in this proposition. There are $33,000,000 in bullion in the vaults of that mint now, and it is increasing about $2,000,000 a month. They can not coin that bullion in that mint with the amount of money given by the committee, and if you send it away from there it will cost $74,000 to transport that amount to Philadelphia, or rather the amount that will be there on the 1st of July. It will cost $60,000 and more to transport what is there now.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman must remember the fact that the Denver mint is employed and the Philadelphia mint is idle.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I do not think that the Philadelphia mint is idle.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not mean that. I mean that it is comparatively idle.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. You mean comparatively idle. The Philadelphia mint is working on outside coinage in addition to doing a portion of the coining for this country. It is doing custom work for other countries, making smaller coins. But I want the gentleman to understand we are not attacking the Philadelphia mint or any other mint. What I am arguing for is our own.

Mr. PALMER. I want to ask the gentleman whether he is aware of the fact that for two months last year 500 employees were laid off at the Philadelphia mint; and I would ask him what he thinks would be the consequences if he got what is proposed? Would not the Philadelphia mint be idle for a greater length of time?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I would not think that. The gentleman must remember that the coinage last year was about $90,000,000, and with the present gold production the amount of coinage will probably be increased very considerably next year. Of this the Denver mint proposes to coin only about $30,000,000 or $40,000,000. Therefore there will be more than enough for both the Denver and Philadelphia mints to do. I can not see that there is any consideration in the light of economy in the proposed reduction, because the Government would lose more practically than the amount which would be saved in the expense of transportation to Philadelphia.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that a great deal of the money coined at Philadelphia is from bullion brought clear across the continent to Philadelphia, going by the Denver mint and San Francisco mint?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I think it is.

Mr. LITTAUER. Have you any facts to that effect?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to state to the gentleman that I have favored in the Coinage Committee and legislation on the floor of this House coining the money at San Francisco and Colorado and other places out there as against Philadelphia, not that I was against Philadelphia, but to save the transportation clear across the country to Philadelphia and back at the the expense of the Government and individuals who have to haul it back. A few days ago the gentleman from New York cut out of one of our appropriation bills the money to pay for hauling our silver coin to the country, and the banks down my way are kicking about it.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. In reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, and also the gentleman from New York, I will state that I understand that the mints at Boise City and Seattle are both now shipping to Philadelphia for coinage purposes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Shipping bullion?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Shipping bullion for the purpose of coinage. The gold and silver which is shipped from the gold and silver producing countries to the mints for coinage has to be transported back again for circulation, because the coin is circulated more largely in those sections, and that is another strong reason for maintaining coinage operations at Denver.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is not this also a fact: By having this mint wide open in Colorado, it induces the gold that comes from Alaska to come into the United States and be coined into our money rather than go to the British possessions and be coined into English money?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I should think that would be the case.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That proof was made in the Committee on Coinage about eighteen months or two years ago.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gold coming from Alaska comes to Seattle and is sent from Seattle to Philadelphia under the prevailing rule.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; I feel sure that the gentleman from New York is mistaken.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I want for a moment to compare the reductions that this bill proposes with the estimates of the Director. The estimates of the Director for the Denver mint for this year are $150,000 for workmen and $50,000 for the contingent expenses. The bill carries $75,000 for workmen and $30,000 for contingent expenses, a reduction of 50 per cent in the workmen's allowance and a reduction of 40 per cent in the contingent allowance.

For the Philadelphia mint the estimates are $400,000 for workmen and $85,000 for contingent expenses. The allowance in the bill is $400,000 for workmen, no discount, and $75,000 for contingent, a discount of less than 12 per cent.

Mr. PALMER. Are you not aware of the fact that the Philadelphia mint was reduced $50,000 from last year?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. From the appropriation of last year; yes. That was a reduction by the Director and not by the committee. I am speaking now of the treatment that this mint is receiving at the hands of this committee.

For the San Francisco mint the recommendation in the estimates was $165,000 for workmen and $50,000 for contingent expenses, and the reduction is fifteen thousand in workmen—less than 10 per cent—and ten thousand in contingent, or 20 per cent; and this is just half the percentage of reduction on the same item for Denver. In other words, out of a total reduction of $135,000 in this appropriation bill for these mints $95,000 is taken from one single institution. I want the committee to appreciate that fact. Out of a total reduction of $135,000, in round numbers, nearly three-quarters are taken from the Denver mint.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will the gentleman tell the committee how much of the amount appropriated for the current year will not be used at Denver, the single institution where the reduction to which you referred takes place?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I have already answered that question. The statement of the superintendent is that there will be about $40,000 unexpended out of this item of $115,000 on the 1st day of July, and that is on a coinage operation of only five months. Now, as I said before, computing the operations for twelve months on that basis, it equals an expenditure of about $180,000, or $30,000 more than the Director asks you to appropriate.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will that $40,000 be available for next year?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Not at all. The $40,000 and also any excess in the contingent fund will be covered back into the Treasury. And by the way, the Director and also the Superintendent of the Mint inform me that the contingent fund will be entirely exhausted before that date.

There is no warrant, gentlemen, in fairness or in economy, and there is no warrant in reason, for the reduction that the committee have ill advisedly made. I do not say they have intended to strike this mint down. I do not suppose for one moment that they intend to injure that institution. I do not suppose that they are discriminating in favor of one mint as against another, but the result of it is exactly that, for it will shut up the Denver mint for six months in the year, and shut it up unjustly.

Now, if there is any section of this country that is entitled to the consideration of the Appropriations Committee in the matter of coinage it is the great gold-producing section of the country. Last year we produced in this country, in round numbers, in gold $85,000,000, and in silver about $29,000,000, or about $114,000,000. Of that sum more than 25 per cent was produced in the single State of Colorado, with a gold output of over $25,000,000 and a silver output of over $6,000,000, and the States that are directly tributary to Denver, from whence the gold comes to that mint—Utah, South Dakota, and New Mexico—swell that total to $37,000,000 in gold and $7,000,000 in silver, or about $44,000,000. In other words, the part of this country that is producing the gold, and the part of this country where the men producing it have the right, under the statute, to take their gold, bring it to the mint, and receive the coin for it, is where this mint is located. Every consideration, therefore, of locality, every consideration of fairness, every consideration of economy, and, we think, every consideration of legislative propriety demands that this mint should receive at least fair treatment at your hands. We do not make any special plea for this section; we do not make any special plea because we are Colorado or because we are near South Dakota or because we are near Utah or Wyoming, but we make the plea because the Congress of the United States has said that a mint should be located there and that gold should be coined there for all comers by the Government and because we have a new mint there which is the finest mint in the United States, and possibly the finest mint in the world—a mint where there are administrative economies in operation that can not be approximated anywhere else. In the single item of the melter and refiners' room there are electrical devices that almost absolutely obliterate the waste and loss occasioned at the older mints.

In the annealing and coining rooms there are new devices and new machinery that very much reduce the cost of operation and that give an extraction very much higher than the older institutions can give, and the gold coin output bears a much higher percentage to the bullion consumed than you can get in the older mints. Do you want to shut down the mint where the work is being done in that way? Do you want the newest plant you have to be closed, the plant where you have the machinery which you took to St. Louis to show to the whole world as your finest product? Do you want to strike an institution of that sort and close its doors for six months in the year? I do not believe this committee will do that, if they understand what they are doing.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I will attempt to present to the committee the facts through which the Committee on Appropriations was led to submit the items as they stand in the bill. I will state in the outset that in considering matters of expenditure at the mints we have ever before us the fact that while the United States has in operation four mints, one mint would be sufficient to turn out all the coinage necessary for the country.

A year ago, when the Director of the Mint presented to us the facts regarding the establishment at Denver, he stated by the 1st of July, 1905, that mint would be in operation as a mint. Members of the committee must bear in mind that we have had an assay office at Denver for many years past. On the statement of the Director that the assay office would be turned into a mint, for which a most elaborate building and most complete machinery had been furnished, we increased the organization of that old assay office, which had cost annually $15,250 for many years, by adding an additional expenditure for organization alone of $23,000.

We added that amount to the appropriation on the basis that the service of these men would be needed for the purpose of conducting the mint after the 1st of July, 1905. To the wages for workmen, which for the assay office in previous years had been allowed $27,000, we added the large sum of $88,000 for the purpose of conducting the operations of the mint in addition to the former and usual provision of $27,000 for the wages of the workmen in connection with the assay office. And then, in the incidental expenditure, we increased from $10,500, which had been allowed the assay office, to $40,000, under the idea that the mint was to begin the first of the fiscal year. That sum total means that we added last year to the appropriation $140,500 for the purpose of opening and conducting this mint to the appropriation previously made of $52,750 when it was conducted as an assay office.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. You do not mean to say that the appropriation would not have been needed if the mint had started at the time it was intended?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; that was the estimate given to us, and it seemed reasonable, if the establishment was to begin as a mint on the 1st of July, and we recommended that in the appropriation.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. How would the fact that only some $40,000 of the labor item would be unexpended on July 1 out of the $115,000 after only five months' operation warrant the committee in making an appropriation of but $75,000 for twelve months' operation?

Mr. LITTAUER. I will come to that shortly and see if I can convince the committee. Members will bear in mind that we appropriated $140,000 over the previous appropriation for the assay office. Now, we have been continually met with expectations unrealized in connection with the Denver mint. The hearings on this topic took place on the 13th of February of this year. At that time, even, the Director of the Mint stated:

We expect to be in complete operation during the coming fiscal year.

My question to him was, "What are your expectations based on—is your machinery installed?"

Yes; we are doing coinage there to-day.

We were advised that the coinage practically begun on the 1st of February. We felt that the expectations unrealized the previous year had cost the Government a large sum of money, especially for salaries of those in the organization of this mint.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. How would it be a cost to the Government when the unexpended portions of the items for labor and for the contingent expenses would be covered back into the Treasury?

Mr. LITTAUER. I am referring to the organization, not to labor. I must admit that the labor cost would not be any different, but the gentleman stated that there would be a balance of $40,000 at the end of this year. There are no facts before us which would lead us to the belief that there will not be $60,000 left over the amount appropriated for wages, for we found out that during the first six months of the year, when a certain amount of labor was used for the installment of machinery, that there was but $27,000 out of $115,000 appropriated for the fiscal year unexpended at the end of the first six months.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. The gentleman, of course, understands that the present wage roll is $8,000 a month there?

Mr. LITTAUER. I have no information to that effect. The information given to us on February 13 of this year is that the work of coinage has started. How rapidly it started we were unable to find out. We do know, however, that coinage has started, and that it will probably progress, and that there will be a large sum or a large part of the amount appropriated for coinage left on hand at the end of the year.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Will the gentleman allow me to put in the RECORD an excerpt from a letter from the Acting Director of the Mint, dated March 20?

Mr. LITTAUER. The Acting Director of the Mint here?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would be quite content to have the gentleman read the letter, but do not want him to read it in my time. Now, we have to take a comprehensive view of the entire coinage problem in determining upon the amounts to appropriate at one place and another. The mint at New Orleans has been reduced to the lowest figures to which any mint could possibly be reduced and still keep in operation. The mint at San Francisco, one of our old mints, has had an appropriation up to the present year of $175,000 for the purpose of paying the wages of coinage. Now, when we come to the consideration of that mint I asked the Director of the Mint, "Do you expect to do as much work at Denver during the coming fiscal year as you have been doing at San Francisco?" Bear in mind that San Francisco in the past has had appropriated $175,000 for this purpose. The estimates for this year were $165,000. We recommend in this bill $150,000. His answer is, "No; we do not." Now, if the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROOKS] should prevail there would be as large a provision for coinage purposes proper at Denver as has been made for San Francisco.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Oh, that is an error.

Mr. BONYNGE. The committee has appropriated $165,000, has it not, for San Francisco?

Mr. LITTAUER. We have in this bill $150,000, and it will be reached in the next paragraph or two.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. While the gentleman is right on that point, will he yield to a question?

Mr. LITTAUER. I should be pleased to yield, but I would like to make my statement first.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. The question has relevance to what the gentleman is saying now.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman may put his question.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Will the gentleman tell the committee why it is that they elected to cut the Denver mint appropriation in two as compared with the estimates and cut the others about 10 or 15 per cent?

Mr. LITTAUER. Because at San Francisco during the current year $175,000 will be expended for wages. The force is there. It is employed, and the gentleman's own argument that he made a few moments ago will bear directly on this point—that there is the mint with an organization of experienced men now employed, and we propose to cut that appropriation from $175,000 to $150,000, taking off one-seventh. At Denver the appropriation for this year was $115,000. The gentleman stated that $40,000 of that will not be expended, so that there could have been expended there only $75,000, and of that amount $27,000 would naturally go to the wages of those engaged in the assay office.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. But that is, of course, on the basis of five months' operation.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is on a basis of what was performed this year and under the organization that is there. Now, again, at Philadelphia $450,000 has been the appropriation for wages for workmen for a number of years. We have not work to do. Our silver is all coined. All the work we have is this gold coinage, and bear in mind that during the past year these mints could not have been employed were it not for the fact that we made one-fifth as many pieces of gold and silver for foreign countries or for our dependencies, as we did for the uses of the United States, or nearly one-fifth. Out of a total coinage of about 85,000,000 pieces of gold and silver, 18,750,000 were for other governments than the United States.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the expense of coinage was increased by reason of that over and above the amount stated by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LITTAUER. The expenses of coinage were increased by a small amount. In other words, the appropriations for the Philadelphia mint were altogether $577,550, and I believe a total of $632,000 was expended at the mint, the balance being obtained through the payments of other countries for work performed.

Mr. SOUTHARD. In the year 1905, the total expenditures of the Philadelphia mint were $686,462.82.

Mr. LITTAUER. That is not on account of coinage alone. There were other operations on that. Six hundred and thirty-two thousand dollars or thereabouts is the figure that I have before me. Now, I find this, that the concentration of coinage means economy. The Philadelphia mint turned out 55,000,000 pieces of gold and silver, and 103,000,000 pieces of copper and nickel at a cost of $632,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much does it cost the Government in transportation to haul the bullion from Denver to Philadelphia?

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe no bullion has been transported from Denver to Philadelphia since 1904.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It costs $1.86 a thousand. Can the gentleman from Colorado tell me how much?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Sixty-one thousand dollars on the gold now stored.

Mr. LITTAUER. Does that answer the question?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Yes. Sixty-one thousand dollars on the gold now stored, and if the estimates of the superintendent are carried out and there be forty millions there on the 1st of July, it will be $74,000, or within $1,000 of this amount they propose to save to the Government by this cut, but which the Government will pay out again to the express companies.

Mr. LITTAUER. To what are you referring, the rate of expressage on bullion or on coin?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. On bullion.

Mr. LITTAUER. Now, then, if that coin were transferred to the East, it would cost so much more, and if coined at Denver and then transferred to the East, where the Acting Director of the Mint advised us the greatest amount of our gold coinage was put into circulation and was stored for the purpose of issuing gold notes, then the expenditure would be on the other side of the ledger.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. And the consignee would pay it, and not the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would like to ask unanimous consent to continue two minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that he may continue two minutes longer.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I will ask that he be given five minutes if he will answer one more question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I would suggest that debate, however, on the paragraph has been exhausted.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Is it not true the expressage on the coins as they leave the mint is paid by the consignees and not by the Government?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is not true in custom. The coin is transferred from San Francisco direct to Philadelphia for the purposes of the Government and paid for by the Government.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Well, that is only when Government exigencies demand it.

Mr. LITTAUER. They are generally such as to make such a demand for transportation.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. The fact is, although in shipping gold from one mint to another the Government pays the cost, a party sending gold to a mint pays the expense of shipment, and the man who goes to that mint and gets the coined gold to circulate in any other locality also pays the expense to the point of distribution.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; but in practice that is not the fact.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why not in practice?

Mr. LITTAUER. Simply because the Government necessities have demanded the transportation of coin from our mints in the far West and frequently from our mint at New Orleans.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And it is a governmental transfer?

Mr. LITTAUER. To where it is demanded.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you not think it is a very wholesome policy to open up these western mints and let the money be minted there which we pour out into this big sink hole in the Philippines rather than to send it to Philadelphia—transferring it from Hell Gate to the Golden Gate, you might say?

Mr. LITTAUER. A great part of the coinage for the Philippines was made at San Francisco.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And a great deal of it was made at Philadelphia; in fact, the most of it.

Mr. LITTAUER. Now, gentlemen, the total expenditure, in round numbers, for coinage has been a million dollars a year. How are we going to continue to expend this amount of money for the smaller amount of coinage needed was the problem we had before us. Where were we going to get the work for all these mints? We felt it was necessary to cut down these expenditures. We have reduced the submissions for the coming year from the appropriations for the current year, $60,000 at Philadelphia, $35,000 at San Francisco, and the item that we submit for Denver is $90,000 more for the purposes of coinage than was formerly expended there when only an assay office. Now, we claim in the interest of economy and good governmental management that we have made a fair proposition and submit a fair appropriation here.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Was the reduction at Philadelphia made on the advice of the Director of the Mint?

Mr. LITTAUER. In part only, that part in connection with the wages of workmen. But bear in mind, gentlemen, the work in Philadelphia could only be continued for ten months. That old and well-organized establishment, turning out satisfactory and superior work, could not be continued because of the lack of work for more than ten months. Now, had the Denver mint been running all this time probably Philadelphia would have to remain idle many months.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Did the committee make any further reduction than that suggested by the Director of the Mint?

Mr. LITTAUER. We made a further reduction of $10,000 in incidental expenditures, but not in wages for workmen.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Is it not true——

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I want to be recognized in my own right to submit a few observations on the bill.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Is it not true during the past year in the mint at Philadelphia there was installed new machinery for the manufacture of blanks for nickels and 1-cent pieces?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; and a great saving to the Government arises from this installation and manufacture there.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. And will not that saving to the Government involve an expenditure of nearly a hundred thousand dollars additional for labor in Philadelphia during the current year? I am so informed.

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, that machinery was installed and the copper and nickel pieces turned out during the past year, and they turned out a hundred and three million pieces.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman a further question? Is it not true the profits from the modern machinery of the Philadelphia mint alone last year in the manufacture of those pieces amounted to nearly $2,000,000, or enough to pay the running expenses of all the mints in the United States?

Mr. LITTAUER. I had not given attention to that phase of the problem.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I am informed that that is true.

Mr. LITTAUER. We were looking to making a proper expenditure without regard to the income.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized as first addressing the Chair.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, to my mind, this is a simple problem, and one that should be very easy of solution. The issue is, Shall we increase the item which provides for wages of workmen at the Denver mint? We have four mints in this country that are doing the coinage to meet the necessities of commerce in our country. It will cost to do this work properly a given sum of money. Your committee gave the matter most careful consideration and reached the conclusion that $667,800 was sufficient money to provide for the wages of workmen at the four mints to provide the necessary coinage for our country. Making up this sum the committee allotted $42,800 to New Orleans for wages of workmen, which is the smallest amount, as stated by the chairman of the subcommittee, that is possible for us to allow and continue the mint at that point. We allotted $400,000 for this purpose at the mint at Philadelphia; we allotted $150,000 to the mint at San Francisco, and $75,000 for the mint at Denver, aggregating $667,800, a sum which we contend is fully ample to pay the wages of all workmen at the four mints to meet all demands for coinage.

Now, gentlemen, if you increase the amount of appropriation for wages of workmen to be expended at the Denver mint, unless you propose to wantonly throw the money away, you ought to reduce the appropriations for wages of workmen to that extent or for an equal amount at the Philadelphia mint or at the other mints; and you can not escape the conclusions. We ought to appropriate enough money to meet the necessities of this service; we ought to give ample funds for the purpose of providing for necessary coinage. But, gentlemen, if you increase the appropriation at Denver for wages of workmen, then you ought to either decrease the appropriation at San Francisco or New Orleans or Philadelphia to an amount equal to the increase at Denver——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. That answers the question I wanted to ask the gentleman.

Mr. BURLESON. You can not possibly escape that conclusion, unless we propose to merely fritter the public money away. Now, personally, and I want to be perfectly candid in dealing with this situation, I think the gold and silver bullion should be principally coined at the Denver mint. I favor the Denver mint because of the saving of cost of transportation of the bullion, which is in a large measure found in that section. But we might just as well look the situation in the face. Unless you propose to close the Philadelphia mint three months in the year, and probably for a longer period, by decreasing the appropriation for wages of workmen at that mint, then you must necessarily vote down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado. If you vote up his amendment, or adopt it, then if you are careful guardians of the people's money, you are bound to reduce the amount to be given to Philadelphia. To increase the appropriation at Denver without making a like decrease in the appropriation for wages of workmen at Philadelphia is to simply throw away the people's money for a useless purpose.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Would it necessarily be reduced at the other points?

Mr. BURLESON. It could not be reduced at New Orleans, because the appropriation for wages of workmen there is just as low as possible, if we are to carry on the mint there. To make a further reduction means to close the mint.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. How about San Francisco?

Mr. BURLESON. It would be unwise to cut down the appropriation for San Francisco, because of the great volume of gold coming from that immediate section and from the Klondike, which is geographically tributary to that point. Now, gentlemen, you can not dodge the situation. If you want to be perfectly just and fair to the people who bear the burden of paying these appropriations, you have either to take off this amount from the Philadelphia appropriation, proposed by the gentleman's amendment, and add it to the Denver appropriation, or——

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. If I am correct in my figures, the total appropriation for labor and contingent expenses in all the mints and assay offices in the United States amounted, in round numbers, to $1,100,000. This sum was carried in your bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. This year.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Your proposed saving is $135,000 over last year. That amounts to 12½ per cent. Now, why will you take 50 or 40 per cent of the current estimates from Denver and practically nothing from these others?

Mr. BURLESON. If I could have my way, I would not do it, as I have already stated, but the majority of the members of the committee thought it wise to permit the Philadelphia mint, that is thoroughly equipped to do all our coinage, so far as that is concerned, to do the bulk of the work, as it has been doing in the past. The Philadelphia mint has an organized force at present in the employ of the Government, and that was the reason that controlled the committee in its efforts to apportion this work. But, as far as that is concerned, I say, without multiplying words about this question, putting this proposition in a nutshell, it will take so much money to do the necessary and needed coinage of our country and this aggregate sum necessary for this work has been apportioned between the four mints; now, if you increase the amount to be expended at one of them, then you ought to decrease the amount to be expended at the other points, unless you are disposed to wantonly throw the money away. Surely you don't want to make an appropriation of money beyond an amount necessary to do this work.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. The gentleman has interjected an element into this discussion that I very much regret, because we have no desire to reduce the appropriation for the Philadelphia mint or the New Orleans mint or the San Francisco mint.

Mr. BURLESON. Of course not; but that is the situation you have confronting you, and you might just as well face it, as far as I am concerned, because I will not vote to increase the cost of mintage at Denver unless you assure us you will aid in reducing the appropriation at Philadelphia.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Is it not true that if the Denver item should stand where the Director left it, the saving in coinage over last year would still be $41,000?

Mr. BURLESON. I will not take issue with you on that proposition, because it is a matter of no consequence and has no bearing on the issue before us. Hence it is not necessary for me to take issue with you. However, I will say to the gentleman that the subcommittee, of which the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] is chairman, having the making up of this bill, gave most careful and painstaking consideration to this question, and reached the conclusion that $667,800 was ample to provide the wages of workmen to do the necessary coinage of our country. Having reached that conclusion, the committee then apportioned the sum among the four mints. The gentleman from Colorado, by amendment, proposes to increase the amount allowed for this purpose to the mint at Denver. If you do so, if your committee was right in its estimate of the amount necessary to do this work, then you must reduce the amount appropriated for this purpose at the Philadelphia mint.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. The $667,800 include only wages of workmen.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; but that is the item you propose to increase, and consequently I do not complicate the issue by discussing the others.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. The Denver item could remain as estimated for by the Director, and the other items could stand as carried in the bill, and still there would be a reduction of $41,000 from last year's appropriation.

Mr. LITTAUER. But the gentleman has admitted a number of times that all of the appropriation for the current year would not and could not be used at Denver. You have stated over and over again that there will be a balance of $40,000 unexpended at Denver. Consequently, though the totals would be reduced, the actual expense would not be reduced.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. That unexpended balance in Denver is only due to the fact that the mint did not start until February, and hence will not have been operated half the current fiscal year.

Mr. LITTAUER. Unquestionably so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to say a word or two by way of giving some information, as I stated a while ago in a colloquial way. A couple of years ago, or at all events in the last Congress, we had up and under a hot fire in the Coinage Committee room the metric system, and that has also been up at this session. In the course of taking testimony on that subject a gentleman who lived in British America appeared as one of the witnesses, and in the course of his evidence he stated that the British Government was establishing assay offices in the corner of British Columbia for the deliberate purpose of catching all of the gold possible that comes from Alaska and having it stamped with the British stamp, thus inviting it into the markets and commerce and monetary arteries of British America. Now, that is an indisputable fact. I remember it distinctly. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] was a member of the committee and happened to have an assay bill pending before the committee, and I was glad to develop that fact in behalf of his bill, because I thought then and I think now that it is a wise policy to keep wide open our assay offices in the northwestern portion of our country particularly, in order that we may catch all of the gold possible coming from Alaska, and, if possible, invite gold from the British possessions to the mints and the money-making machinery of the Federal Government.

Mr. LITTAUER. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the assay office at Seattle was established in 1900.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why did you do it?

Mr. LITTAUER. In order to draw to that assay office the gold coming from Alaska and to keep it from going to British Columbia.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly; and I was instrumental. I am glad to say, in having that done; and I am just as interested now, Mr. Chairman, in not having any one of these western mints minimized in order to build up Philadelphia or any other eastern mint. Philadelphia is not in the gold and silver producing territory; it is thousands of miles away from where the gold and silver come from, and I want to say to my friend from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] that I am just as economical as he is.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; but the Philadelphia mint is the most expensive mint we have in this country.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why should it be?

Mr. BURLESON. It is competent to do all the minting for the whole United States.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why should it be more expensive than Denver or San Francisco? The transportation—hauling bullion to it and coin from it—must make it a costly mint. Certainly it is not the most important geographically. Now, I do not want to strike Philadelphia at all; I do not want to lay heavy hands on her. Legislation should not be for the benefit of Philadelphia and Denver and New Orleans and San Francisco; it should be for the benefit of all the people of this country; and we should keep open the mints—build them up close to the gold and silver fields. The easterners come from Connecticut, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Maine, and bring their cotton machinery to the cotton fields of the South, where they know that they can make the goods cheaper than they can to ship raw cotton to the New England States and send the goods back South and elsewhere.

Yet in the wisdom of this great committee, headed by the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota aided by the distinguished gentleman from New York, they have minimized the importance of these western mints, cut down San Francisco, cut down Denver and are building up Philadelphia, which is thousands of miles away from where the raw gold comes to the shores of this country.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why certainly, my dear sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. While Philadelphia may not be in the center of the gold-producing section, it is in the section of the East where the great bulk of the money of the country is expended.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to say to my good friend that if money was used as my good friend from Philadelphia uses it, we should not have as much money troubles in the world as we have to-day. [Laughter.] He treats his fellowmen fairly and remembers the golden rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have coined a great deal of money for the Philippine Islands, mostly at Philadelphia. Why, in the name of heaven, was the raw bullion hauled from Nevada and Colorado and California, carried to Philadelphia, unless it was to increase railroad tolls at the expense of the Government? Why was it hauled to Philadelphia with the great high tariff paid the railroads, and then coined—I do not care at what expense; of course, it was legitimate—then hauled back to the Golden Gate and shipped to the Philippine Islands?

Why was it not coined at San Francisco? Why was it not coined at Colorado? Why not now build up these mints, that we may save the railroad tolls against which we are standing here to-day as a great unit trying to regulate them? Why cut down Denver and New Orleans to the minimum, as the gentleman from Texas says? Silver comes from Mexico, gold comes from Mexico; the farmers of Texas and the farmers of the Southwest want silver and they want gold and they want money. Why not build up that mint, too? I have fought that nine years, to keep Congress from shutting up the mint at New Orleans. There is some one always trying it shut it up. Why thus oppress New Orleans, historic city, sacred place, where Jackson told the enemy when they came again to see us to leave their swords behind them. [Applause.] Geographically it is splendidly situated to catch the gold and silver from the West; geographically it is splendidly situated to catch the gold and silver coming from Mexico and from South America, if you please, where we are now about to dig a ditch if we can get honest men to do it, and I thank God that we have got one, the Secretary of War, Judge Taft, and I believe he will do it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, why be penny wise and pound foolish about Denver. I never expect to be there. Denver is nothing to me except a beautiful little city that has risen up in the great Sahara, that is a monument to her people and our country. It will be cheaper than railroad transportation, cheaper than to bring the gold from California and Nevada and coin it in the East, and then ship it back to San Francisco again. Now, we expect to find gold in the Philippine Islands. I have been told, possibly to draw me away from my anti-imperial devotion, for I believe that the Constitution follows the flag, and I don't want the flag to go anywhere that the Constitution does not go—possibly they told me there was gold in the Philippines for that purpose. If it was all gold, I should want to bring back the American eagle and the flag and the dust of those honored heroes that have died there under the flag in that disease-breeding and un-American country.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad that I came into the House when you were about to be penny wise and pound foolish. I love Philadelphia. I go over there sometimes and have a glorious——

A MEMBER. Time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Opportunity. [Laughter.] And

I am satisfied if I should ever have the opportunity of facing my charming friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, General BINGHAM, I would have the time of my life, and I hope it won't be long. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROOKS] wants. He always wants something. It is the general complaint with the gentleman from Colorado that he wants something, and I want to say, even if it is to get some rubber-neck machinery, that he usually is right. In his rubber matter he was in part wrong, and I opposed him. In this he is entirely right, because he wants to keep Congress from destroying that mint, and I am aiding him. I am not going to vote to cut down these mints in the West. It is unwise—a bad policy. We can also save railroad tolls if we do this. I am opposed to it because I want to catch all the gold coming from Alaska possible and stamp the American eagle on it. I want to build up that place and to save the railroad tolls in hauling the bullion and in hauling it to the Philippines, and pay our soldiers out West at a small expense. Why not coin it there and take it out to the soldiers and give them clean money—and I am for clean metal money and clean paper money for the humble soldiers, too. So I say it is a mistaken policy to refuse to cut down the Philadelphia mint, because they say if you cut down the Philadelphia mint you cut it down to build up the mint at Denver. Do right, though the heavens fall. I say Denver geographically is more important to this country now as a mint center than Philadelphia is or can be. San Francisco is of more importance, you might say, than Denver is, because it is closer to the Philippine Islands, where we are obliged to take our silver money to pay off our governmental expenses in that country.

Mr. BONYNGE rose.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that under the rule debate is exhausted on this paragraph.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Chariman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado moves to amend the amendment by striking out the last word, which is in order under the rules.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], in charge of the bill, opened his remarks by stating that one mint would do all the coinage that was necessary for the country. With all due respect to the eminent gentleman who is in charge of this bill and to the Appropriations Committee that has added so much legislation to an appropriation bill, permit me to say to the gentleman from New York, and to call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact, that Congress, by an act signed by the President, has determined that there shall be four mints doing coinage for the United States, and not the one mint that the gentleman from New York refers to. In a letter that I received the other day from the Secretary of the Treasury there is this statement as to the amount of money that has been expended for constructing and equipping the mint at Denver: The cost of the site and of the construction of the mint building at Denver was $800,000, and the amount appropriated for the equipment of the same, with machinery, appliances, and furniture, was $345,000; making a total of $1,145,000 for the construction and equipment of that institution. That amount has just been expended, Mr. Chairman, and the mint was not completed until last year. It opened for actual coinage purposes on the 1st day of February, 1906. It has, therefore, been engaged in actual coinage since the 1st of February—just about two months.

Now, after the Government has expended more than $1,000,000 there for the erection and equipment of that mint, we are met with a proposition by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, or by the gentleman in charge of this bill, that we shall not appropriate any money to operate the mint for which the Government has expended that amount. The Director of the Mint, in making his estimate to the Appropriations Committee, based it upon the amount of coinage that would be done at the Denver mint during the next fiscal year. He states that fact in the letter to which I have called attention, and from which I desire to read the following:

> To conduct active coinage operations at the mint in Denver during the fiscal year 1907, it is estimated by the Department that the sum of $150,000 would be required for wages of workmen and $50,000 for incidental and contingent expenses.
> This estimate is based upon the probable coinage at Denver of thirty to forty millions of dollars in gold, and from one to three million dollars in silver per annum.

The estimate of the Director of the Mint for the wages of workmen was $150,000. This committee, without taking any testimony to find out how much it would cost for the wages of workmen for the next fiscal year to coin the gold that is now in the vaults of the Denver mint, arbitrarily cut that estimate in two and make it $75,000?

Mr. LITTAUER. Will the gentleman please state what necessity there is for coining the gold now in the Denver mint?

Mr. BONYNGE. Yes; very gladly; and it was the next proposition I was coming to; because it gives just this choice, Mr. Chairman: Either you will coin that gold that is now in the vaults at the Denver mint—and, remember, there are $33,000,000 of gold bars in the Denver mint—or else you will take these gold bars and ship them to the Philadelphia mint at an expense to the Government of just exactly, or practically the same amount, as we ask for as an increased appropriation to-day to do that work at the Denver mint. That is the whole proposition in a nutshell. It will not save the Government of the United States $1,000, whether you coin it at Denver or ship from Denver to Philadelphia. If you coin it at Denver you make use of a plant for which the Government has paid over $1,000,000, and the amount expended is paid in wages to American workmen. If you coin it at Philadelphia you pay the same amount to railroad and express companies.

Mr. LITTAUER. But what would you do with it after you coin it?

Mr. BONYNGE. You will issue your gold certificates against the gold.

Mr. LITTAUER. Or else transport the coin to the East, where it may be distributed.

Mr. BONYNGE. The Secretary of the Treasury states in this same letter that it is very probable that that gold will remain in the vaults of the Denver mint, and here is his language.

Quoting his exact language he says:

> It is probable that the greater part of the gold coined at Denver mint will remain in the vaults of that institution, especially if the practice of paying depositors who desire it in eastern exchange be continued.

And if it should be sent to the East the consignees would pay the expense for shipping the gold coin and not the Government of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. LITTAUER. Provided it was shipped to a consignee.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that five minutes more time be granted to the gentleman from Colorado.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Colorado may be allowed five minutes additional time. Is there objection?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I will not object to unanimous consent with the distinct understanding that after the five minutes are exhausted we have a vote on this paragraph.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take time under that condition, because the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures desires to be heard upon this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BONYNGE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio, if he can take the five minutes.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, this motion applies merely to this mint, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the five-minute rule, according to the rules, it is not in order for a gentleman to yield his time to another.

Mr. KEIFER. But he is entitled to take it himself.

Mr. BONYNGE. Now, then, Mr. Chairman, it appears that there are at present in the vaults of the Denver mint the $33,000,000 in gold bars. In addition to the amount that is now in the vaults it is estimated that there will be deposited in this mint during every month of the next fiscal year two and a half millions in gold bars. It may perhaps be necessary to ship some of that gold to Philadelphia, because even if we get the amount that we are asking for by this amendment it would not pay for the wages of the necessary workmen to coin all the gold that will be deposited in the Denver mint during the next fiscal year. Some comment has been made upon the fact that we did not use all of the appropriation that was made to us for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906. Of course we did not, gentlemen of the committee, because we were disappointed in not having the mint ready for coinage the 1st day of July, as we had anticipated, and now we are charged with having been negligent as I understand the argument of the gentleman from New York because we did not use up all the appropriation that the committee made to us last year. We feel, Mr. Chairman, that it is an evidence of economical management of the mint at Denver that notwithstanding the fact that this committee had appropriated for our use last year $115,000 the management of that mint at Denver was so careful of the interests of the Government that it did not employ all of the workmen it had anthority to employ and for whose wages appropriations were made?

Mr. LITTAUER. How else could you have spent any more money?

Mr. BONYNGE. Why we had authority of law to engage the workmen, but we did not engage them until their service were necessary.

Mr. LITTAUER. Authority of law under the direction of the Director of the Mint.

Mr. BONYNGE. Yes; but we did not employ workmen until the work was ready, which was on the 1st day of February.

Mr. LITTAUER. But you must admit that you had salaried officers drawing large salaries before there was any use for them.

Mr. BONYNGE. No; not before there was any use for them. There were officers appointed. The Secretary of the Treasury and Director of the Mint requested their appointment. Their services were necessary, for the reason that the force at the mint was being organized at Denver, and before we could commence the operations of the mint there had to be somebody in charge of the preliminary arrangements for the opening of the mint and in charge of the placing of the machinery and making all the necessary arrangements for its actual opening as a coinage mint. When the President sent those nominations to the Senate it was because, in his judgment, it was necessary that these men should be appointed at that time. They were appointed, but the workmen were not engaged until February of this year. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know there is very much more I can say upon this proposition. It resolves itself into the question whether or not Congress is now going to make use of the plant which it has erected and equipped at great expense. We have the gold, we have the workmen, and we have the machinery. We have the latest and most improved machinery, and it is a fact that can be demonstrated that we can coin at less expense at the Denver mint than we can coin elsewhere. I want now to call attention to one fact brought out by the gentleman from Texas. He contended if we make this increased appropriation for Denver we ought to cut down the appropriation for some other place. Let me call attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that the total amount appropriated last year for the four coinage mints was $976,000. If this committee should approve of this amendment and increase the amount to $150,000 and give us what I shall ask for contingent expenses, the total amount appropriated for the four mints will be $40,000 less this year than it was last year. So that it does not involve the question of an increase in the expenditure of the Government for the coinage that will take place at these various mints. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that no argument has been advanced whatsoever even to show that there will be a saving to the Government by refusing to give us the appropriation we ask for, and every consideration of economy, of good management, and of sound business principles in connection with the coinage of the United States is in favor of increasing the appropriation to the amount asked for by this amendment.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the bill as it is, although I regret to see that there has been no change made with reference to the mint at New Orleans. We understood last year when this bill was under consideration that no more appropriations would be proposed for that establishment. It seems to me there are two questions, and only two, which should enter into the consideration of the maintenance and support of mints: First, the character of the coinage, and that over and above all others; second, the distribution of the money when coined. So far as the coinage is concerned, it is admitted by every other country, I believe, as well as by the Treasury officials of this country, that it would be more nearly perfect and less easily counterfeited if it was all done in one place, and that is where the best machinery and the best facilities are provided. There is no question but that would be in Philadelphia if that was the only consideration, but there is another. This country is one of large area, and the question of the distribution of the money when coined is one of great importance. We have multiplied assay offices; we have multiplied mints. We have discontinued one or two mints, and I know from the testimony taken before the Coinage Committee when I had the pleasure of being a member of that committee that it is the view of the Treasury Department that the wisest method of distribution would be to maintain the mints at Philadelphia, Denver, and San Francisco, and that all of the others, including the assay offices, should be ultimately discontinued in the interest of economy and good management, and that the Government should rely on these three. Waiving the question of excellency of coinage and considering only the cost of transportation and distribution, we should rely on these three for the future work of the Government, and it would be the best for all concerned.

Now, in my judgment, it would be a mistake to increase any of these appropriations. Acting in accord with what I have said to be the view of the Director of the Mint, I think it would be wise to cut off New Orleans. It was certainly understood in the debate last year here that the appropriation then proposed would be the last one that would be made for New Orleans, and that this year the bill would be confined to these three. I am going to vote even for the New Orleans proposition, Mr. Chairman, this year, in the hope and expectation that the desire of the officers of the Mint Bureau will be considered next year and that the general plan which they have laid out of maintaining the three mints, and these three only, will be provided for by the Appropriations Committee next year.

Let me show to the House just for a moment the unwisdom of the course we are pursuing now in regard to assay offices. I listened with much pleasure to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES]. I want to say to him, as far as the establishment of these assay offices is concerned, in my judgment they did not have one particle of effect upon the accumulation of gold. But aside from that, the cost to the Treasury should be considered. Look at the expense for Carson City. They paid $10,435 expenses and earned $812. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who is, in my judgment, acting wisely in trying to reduce the expenses of unremunerative custom-houses, might well give his attention to this proposition as well. At Boise City we pay $13,000 to earn $3,000; in Helena, $23,000 to earn $4,000; in Charlotte, $4,000 to earn $1,000, and in St. Louis, $1,000 to earn $770. All of these assay offices should be dispensed with, and we ought to concentrate the assaying and all other work of this kind in these three mints in Philadelphia, Denver, and San Francisco, for it costs no more to transport the bullion than it does to ship the coin, and a concentration of the work would result in great saving to the Treasury.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in eight minutes.

Mr. HOGG. I would like to be heard.

Mr. LITTAUER. And that the gentleman from Ohio have five minutes and the gentleman from Colorado three.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that all debate on this paragraph and amendments close in eight minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to be a question, and the only question seems to be, whether this mint at Denver ought to be kept running throughout the year or not. They have a force there of about 51 workmen.

Mr. BONYNGE. One hundred and two now.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I thought it was about 50.

Mr. BONYNGE. It was that some time ago.

Mr. SOUTHARD. They have an accumulation of $23,000,000 of gold in the vaults. It is coming in at the rate of about $2,000,000 or $2,500,000 per month. The Director of the Mint states that there will be sufficient work there to keep the mint running during the year, provided the gold coming into that mint is coined there. Now, the question is, Ought it to be kept running or ought it to stop after the expiration of six months? He estimates (and I presume there is no question about it) that in order to keep that mint running full time it will take practically the whole of this amount.

Mr. LITTAUER. To keep it running at what rate? At its full capacity?

Mr. SOUTHARD. At the capacity at which it is now running.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman said here that it only took $8,000 a month to pay the force as now organized.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I will say that the Director of the Mint stated to me yesterday that possibly this mint could be kept running during the entire year for the sum of $125,000, but that, in his judgment, the force would have to be somewhat curtailed in order to get through the year with that sum. So I assume that the Director has paid some attention to this matter and that the figures he has given are substantially correct.

We have four mints in this country—one at Philadelphia, one at San Francisco, one at Denver, and one at New Orleans. It has been stated time and again by the Treasury Department, by the Secretary of the Treasury, and by the Director of the Mint that we have more mints than are necessary; and yet not more than a couple of years ago the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, after listening to the arguments in favor of a new mint (those arguments being based largely on the question of transportation), were convinced that it would be economy for the Government to establish a new mint at the city of Seattle, in the State of Washington. I do not think the chairman of the committee was convinced, but I say that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures seemed to have been convinced, because they reported favorably a bill providing for the establishment of an additional mint at Seattle. The argument was that the Government would save a large amount in transportation; that it costs practically $2 per thousand to transport gold or bullion to and from the mints where it is coined. Now, I apprehend that gold and silver are a good deal like wheelbarrows—that they go where there is a demand for them—and that there is very little in this question of transportation. It costs as much in this case to transport the coin as it does to transport the bullion, and, I take it, practically as much to transport the bullion as it does to transport the coin; but I am getting away from the question. The question is simply this: Should this mint be kept running the whole year through, or should it be stopped after the expiration of six months? The Director of the Mint believes it should be kept running the entire year, and why? One of the reasons he gives is this: You have a large force of skilled men there, employed in coining the gold and silver. If you stop that mint, you scatter your men, you lose them, and when you start your mint again you have got to start with an inferior force; you have got to go to the trouble of collecting your men and organizing them anew each year. And, further, when the mint lies idle a part of the time, your machinery deteriorates; so, on the whole, he believes it to be economy and a wise proposition to keep this mint running throughout the year. That is all I have to say with reference to this question.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bills of the following titles:

S. 5204. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge or bridges across the Yellowstone River in Montana; and

S. 5211. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Snake River, at or near Lewiston, Idaho.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4825. An act to provide for the construction of a bridge across Rainey River, in the State of Minnesota; and

S. 536. An act amending the act of August 3, 1892, chapter 361, entitled "An act fixing the fees of jurors and witnesses in the United States courts in certain States and Territories" (27 Stat. L., p. 347).

The message also announced that the Vice-President appointed Mr. BACON as one of the conferees on the bill (S. 1345) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States, in place of Mr. MORGAN, excused from further service, on his own request.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HOGG] is entitled to the floor for three minutes.

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee, it is not my purpose to take any considerable time in discussing this question. I have been very much interested in the plea that has been made here for Philadelphia. I understand that one of the principal reasons given why this should be done is that the mint should be where the money is to be distributed. Now, I can well conceive, from the investigations that are going on, why in that view of the case Philadelphia should need a mint. [Laughter.] And also why our friends from New York are so anxious to have a Government mint where the money may be distributed. But I am quite sure that after these investigations are concluded there will not be so much necessity for the distribution of money there. [Laughter.] But I am inclined to think that all this difficulty that we are now experiencing as to the Denver and the Philadelphia mint, is hardly a proper subject for discussion in connection with this question. There is only one thing to determine. The Government has seen fit to establish this mint at Denver. It has paid out a million and a quarter of dollars for that purpose. Now, the only question left is, Shall the mint be operated? If so, how much money will it take to operate that mint?

I have a list of these statements as to the different estimates. There is only one question left untouched, I think, and that is as to the monthly pay roll that is necessary to run the mint as it is being run at the present time. I have a statement here from the melter of the mint, who states that the present pay roll is in excess of $10,000 a month. That will be required to carry on the operations of the mint under the present force, and with the increased activity of the mint additional employees will have to be used. Ten thousand dollars a month would be $120,000 a year. This committee has seen fit in their wisdom to allow $75,000 for the purpose of carrying on the business of that mint. I do not think this is a matter, gentlemen, that ought to be determined by locality. I think, as my friend has stated, this mint ought to be operated, being placed as it is, in the region where gold is produced, where a saving can be made to the Government as to transportation.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Ohio, being on his feet, asked for five minutes and the gentleman from Colorado three minutes. The gentleman from New York moved, and the committee agreed to the motion, that debate close at the end of eight minutes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be allowed to continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be allowed five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, are we proceeding by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the motion which was to close debate the debate was exhausted, and the gentleman from New York has asked unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be allowed five minutes.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate that the question of locality should have entered into the issue to any extent. It seems to me the question should be this: Are the facilities already existing, whether it be at San Francisco, Philadelphia, New Orleans, or Denver, adequate to all the necessities of the Government in the way of coinage? It is held by the Director of the Mint that Philadelphia is already equipped, that it has the perfected machinery, it has a trained corps of experts, and that there is not enough business to keep the labor of the Philadelphia mint employed.

Colorado is singularly fortunate in having as its Representatives a solid delegation that perhaps is unrivaled by any sister Commonwealth. If there are three stronger men from any one State where there are but three Representatives from that State, I have never seen them. [Laughter.] Their persuasive eloquence was such the other day that they took away from Philadelphia the coinage of subsidiary coin, duplicating machinery, entailing expense for other facilities at a cost more than ample for the coinage, more than ample for all the subsidiary minor coin of the country; and yet, my friends from Colorado became so eloquent, their powers of persuasion were such that when it came to a vote there were only three Members of the whole House who voted against it. We from Pennsylvania did not dare to stand up against their persuasive eloquence.

Mr. BONYNGE. If the gentleman will allow me, I want to say that the gentleman is mistaken in saying that we took away the coinage of subsidiary coin.

Mr. SIBLEY. Well, minor coinage.

Mr. BONYNGE. Neither did we take away the coinage of the minor coin from Philadelphia; we simply amended the law so that we might take away some of the minor coin from Philadelphia, some of the pennies and nickels, and coin them at Denver, while they might coin some at Philadelphia.

Mr. SIBLEY. That is merely duplicating. My friend from Colorado is an example of what I was saying about persuasiveness of the Members from Colorado. We recognize Denver as a beautiful city, none more beautiful. It has as many fine homes as any city on this continent. I am sure that our regard for the Representatives from that State is such that it would lead us to expend some considerable portion of the Government's revenues in the duplication of machinery and processes already more than adequate and more than ample for the purpose of the coinage of the United States. Therefore, if I vote against this amendment this time, it will be because I have recovered from the eloquence with which the gentlemen stampeded this House on a recent occasion, when they took the subsidiary coinage, or that portion of it which they will have, from Philadelphia, under the measure which passed this House. I believe the committee has fairly considered this, and I hope the House will stand by the action of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LITTAUER) there were—ayes 86, noes 56.

Mr. SIBLEY. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROOKS] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER].

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 82, noes 61.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For incidental and contingent expenses, including melter and refiner's salaries and loss on sale of sweeps arising from the manufacture of bullion for coinage and wastage and loss on sale of coiner's sweeps, $50,000.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, page 69, strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I will state that that is a necessary amendment in order to take care of the expenses that the increased amount for wages and workmen will produce.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mint at New Orleans, La.: For superintendent, $3,500; assayer, melter and refiner, and coiner, at $2,500 each; assistant assayer, assistant melter and refiner, and assistant coiner, at $1,900 each; chief clerk and cashier, at $2,000 each; bookkeeper, $1,600; assistant cashier, $1,200; private secretary to superintendent, $900; one clerk, $1,200; one messenger, $900; one elevator conductor, $800; in all, $27,300.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 69, strike out line 13 and all following, down to and including the word "dollars," in line 5, page 70, and in lieu thereof substitute the following:

"Mint at New Orleans, to be hereafter conducted as an assay office: For assayer in charge, $3,000; assistant assayer, $1,500; one clerk, $1,000; in all, $5,500.

"For wages of workmen and watchmen, $7,500; for contingent expenses, $3,000."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order to that amendment until it is explained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that his amendment is to strike out two paragraphs which have not yet been read. The gentleman can move to strike out one paragraph, which has already been read, and give notice that he will move to strike out the other.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to strike out that portion of the bill described in the amendment and yet to preserve——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana to reserve the point of order?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. SOUTHARD. And yet to preserve the situation there as an assay office. It is possible that there would be some work for an assay office at New Orleans. There is very little to commend it as a mint. The earnings of the institution last year, by recollection is, were something like $2,000, and the total coinage of the mint amounted to something over $2,000,000. The appropriation for the maintenance of this mint year after year has been about $90,000 for this small amount of coinage. Year after year the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Mint have recommended the discontinuance of the mint operations at New Orleans until, evidently tired and weary, they have ceased to mention it altogether.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman is aware that the provision for a mint at New Orleans went out two years ago in the House.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I was about to call attention to that. Two years ago the legislative appropriation bill contained three paragraphs, a copy of which is embodied in this amendment which I have just sent to the Clerk's desk. This was contained in the legislative appropriation bill of two years ago, and my recollection is that the provision remained in the bill, went to the Senate, and was stricken out in the Senate, and the old provision continuing the mint was restored to the bill. So that there may be no misunderstanding about it, I will read that provision from the bill of two years ago:

"Mint at New Orleans, to be hereafter conducted as an assay office: For assayer in charge, $3,000; assistant assayer, $1,500; one clerk, $1,000; in all, $5,500.

"For wages of workmen and watchmen, $7,500; for contingent expenses, $3,000.

The report of the Director of the Mint for the year 1905 shows that the standard weight and value of gold and silver coin deposited at New Orleans, La., during the fiscal year 1905 was $1,725,000. There were purchased over the counter eight hundred and forty-six and a fraction standard ounces of uncurrent domestic gold coin; in all, valued at about $15,000. Now, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is not economy, it is not good business, it is contrary to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury and to the recommendations of the Director of the Mint, and contrary to good business judgment, to maintain a mint at New Orleans.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. He says it is contrary to the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I say the director of the mint, and, if I am properly advised, the Secretaries of the Treasury, time and again have recommended the discontinuance of mint operations at New Orleans.

Mr. LITTAUER. I can give the gentleman just an absolute fact, and that is that when this item was so amended in the bill that passed this House as to make provision for an assay office instead of a mint it went over to the Senate, and while under consideration there the Secretary of the Treasury recommended to me, one of the conferees, that it be continued as a mint.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I will say my recollection is that before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures the director of the mint has stated time and again that it was not profitable, and that, in his judgment, it would be advisable to discontinue the mint at New Orleans. Now, I will not say that I have had any direct communication with the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to it, but the argument has been that we have a superfluity of mints; that we have more mints than we ought to continue in operation. If that is so, here is a mint that is being conducted at a loss, at an extravagant expenditure, considering the amount of work done.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I have no special interest in the mint at New Orleans, but from what is said by the gentleman from New York who has charge of this bill, if the mint should be, by action of the House, converted into an assay office, it would in all probability be restored at the other end of the Capitol, and I feel this way about it, that it is, perhaps, a matter of too much importance to be taken up and disposed of under the five-minute rule in the Committee of the Whole. The Committee on Appropriations, having investigated this question exhaustively, and, of course, having before it the history of the mint at New Orleans, reports the appropriation for it and makes no recommendation for its discontinuance or conversion into an assay office, although the bill contains numerous items of new legislation. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I shall insist upon the point of order and I think it is well taken, because the amendment expressly provides for the conversion of the mint into an assay office. It provides for a superintendent of the assay office at an increased salary, etc.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard upon the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Yes. The employees are precisely the employees as those mentioned in the present bill. Their salaries are not increased—perhaps I am wrong about that. The amendment simply reduces expenditures, it may change the name in the bill of an employee, but it is simply reducing the amount appropriated and does not necessarily change existing law. The effect of it would not be to change existing law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. SOUTHARD. The effect would be simply to reduce the amount of appropriation by reducing the number of employees without changing their salary.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, a suggestion, if the gentleman pleases. The bill provides for a superintendent at the mint at New Orleans, La., at $3,500?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And the amendment provides for a superintendent of assay office, I believe, at $3,500?

Mr. SOUTHARD. For an assayer in charge.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. At $3,500. That is a new office altogether. The law says that the superintendent of the mint shall be entitled to a salary of $3,500 a year, but now it is proposed to create another office with different duties and functions—that is, an assayer in charge, and provide that he shall be paid $3,500 a year for different duties, different responsibilities, and different functions. I think there can be no doubt it is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that he will have to move to modify his amendment so as to confine the striking out to the paragraph which has been read, which embraces the part between lines 15 and 24, inclusive, on page 69. The gentleman can give notice that if his amendment shall be adopted he will move to strike out the other two paragraphs.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the amendment to be so modified, and without objection it will be so considered. The paragraph proposed to be amended appropriates for the mint at New Orleans and for a superintendent of the mint and for refiners, coiners, etc. The amendment provides that the mint at New Orleans shall be hereafter conducted as an assay office. That seems to the Chair to change the purpose of the establishment at New Orleans as now defined by law. The proposed amendment then provides, not for a superintendent of the mint, but for an assayer in charge, a different office, the salary being the same, possibly the person filling the office being the same, but apparently an office and a title different from anything known to the existing law governing this mint. It seems to the Chair that this is a change of existing law upon an appropriation bill, in violation of clause 2 of Rule XXI, and that the point of order must be sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For wages of workmen and adjusters, and not exceeding $10,920 for other clerks and employees, $42,800.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the paragraph. Does the gentleman desire to be heard?

Mr. SOUTHARD. For just a moment. It seems to me that the location of this mint, the cost of its maintenance, the fact that no gold and silver is actually tributary to New Orleans except, as I understand it, a little which comes from Central America, and the fact that its discontinuance has been recommended by those who are best able to judge of its value as a mint, ought to induce us to cut out these expenditures and save a good portion of this $90,000 per annum which it costs to maintain it. I am advised that most of the metal which is coined into money is shipped from localities at the expense of the Government from the localities where it is produced to the city of New Orleans for coinage; that this expense, as I have already said, is borne by the Government; that its operations are unduly and unnecessarily expensive, when this same work can be carried on at the other mints at greatly reduced cost. Now, we have been talking a great deal about reducing expenses. Here is an opportunity to reduce expenses, to economize, and I want to see how many Members present are ready to vote to economize when they have a real opportunity.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio should prevail, the mint at New Orleans would be discontinued, nor would there be any assay office there. The amendment would entirely do away with this establishment. Now, I agree with him that the mint at New Orleans is an extravagance, but no more so than the mint at Denver. The mint at New Orleans is not needed; the mint at Denver never was needed, and never ought to have been constructed if simply economical interests were considered.

Mr. SOUTHARD. We have a mint at Denver.

Mr. LITTAUER. We have a mint at Denver and we have a mint at New Orleans. I do not see why we should not give a little gratuity, so to speak, to one section of the country as well as to the other. I believe an assay office ought to be at New Orleans. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that that section of the country should be served as well as the section about St. Louis, where there is also an assay office.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Is not the percentage of cost as compared with the product at New Orleans out of all proportion when compared to any other mint?

Mr. LITTAUER. I used to think so; but the little examination I have given to this subject this year makes me feel to the contrary. We found at New Orleans this year there were 4,088,000 pieces coined, at a total expense of $80,000, and at San Francisco there were 26,450,000 pieces coined, at an expense of $402,000. So that the difference is not a great amount in the actual proportionate cost. There are incidental expenses, however, in connection with the New Orleans mint, in shipping bullion there to be coined and shipping the coins back again, just as I believe there are expenses in connection with the Denver mint. But it seems to me that we must have, or we ought to have, an assay office at New Orleans, and that we should not cut this matter out entirely. With the opening of the Panama Canal at some future day, we may then be receiving a larger amount of silver and perhaps gold than now comes to New Orleans.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that we already have an assay office at St. Louis, which is running, as I understand, at an actual loss.

Mr. LITTAUER. We have a number of assay offices running at an actual loss, and they ought to be cut out just as much as this St. Louis office.

Mr. SOUTHARD. That negatives the necessity for so many assay offices as we now have.

Mr. LITTAUER. And the original necessity of as many mints as we now have. We could cut out the one the gentleman supported a minute ago as well as we could leave out this one.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Does not that rather negative the gentleman's statement that we ought to have an assay office at New Orleans?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; I think the amount of bullion coming in from Mexico and coming in from South America by the shipping that finds its port at New Orleans demands an assay office there.

Mr. SOUTHARD. For the operating and refining the charges amount to only about $2,000 at St. Louis.

Mr. LITTAUER. It shows that there is not a great amount of work there.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the same argument I made a few minutes ago as to the Denver and San Francisco mints applies with equal force to the New Orleans mint. I have no interest in any one of these mints, save that any private citizen should have, except as my duty here as a Member of Congress. I think I alluded to New Orleans in the course of what I said as to the other two mints.

For nine years the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] knows that some one has been trying to destroy by strangulation—withholding appropriations—the New Orleans mint. The gentleman from Ohio says that the Director of the Mint has time and again recommended the discontinuance of this mint at New Orleans. The gentleman from Ohio has been chairman of the Coinage Committee, that has that matter in charge, for nine years, and yet no sort of a bill has ever been reported to this House to repeal the law that established the New Orleans mint. Not one. That would have been the regular and proper way to discontinue this mint. During this entire session of Congress the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] has been trying to foist upon the American people the metric system, which would cost the manufacturers and people of this country untold millions and cause them great financial distress.

Instead of following the recommendation of the Director of the Mint on the New Orleans mint, the gentleman has spent his time and that of his committee in this metric matter, which no Director of the Mint has ever recommended to Congress, and no one wants but a few interested, harping theorists. The gentleman has neglected the recommendation of the Director of the Mint to close the New Orleans mint. He has neglected his duty as the chairman of that great committee in that respect, and now he comes here and makes an attack on the New Orleans mint, in the face of the fact that the gentleman knows that this House and the Senate and the President of the United States have approved appropriations time and again for the continuation of that mint, and in spite of the fact that he knows that the Republican party and the Democratic party and the Republican President, and the great Secretary of War are trying to open up a "ditch" down here across the Isthmus of Panama which will make it absolutely necessary for us to keep this mint in operation at New Orleans.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Where is the bill to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The New Orleans mint is what you are trying to strike out of this bill. Why didn't you strike out the "mint at Carson City, Nev.?"

Mr. SOUTHARD. I thought the gentleman referred to some other bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman refused to strike out of this bill the item "Mint at Carson, Nev.," yet he jumps on the mint at New Orleans with all his might, and tries to smother it by taking this money away from it. Mr. Chairman, if the New Orleans mint was ever a necessity (and the gentleman knows the Republican and Democratic parties have perpetuated it) it certainly is a necessity now that we are building the Panama Canal, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] said only a moment ago we will need this mint at New Orleans. Only a few minutes ago the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] said to me that his banks were now complaining about having to pay freight on silver dollars. So are mine.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Please excuse me a moment. I will ask the committee to give you time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do not interrupt me, please.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Does not the gentleman know that there are no mint operations carried on at Carson?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then, why don't you strike out the words "mint at Carson, Nev.?" It has misled me. The gentleman swells at a gnat and swallows a giraffe.

Now, Mr. Chairman, only a few days ago, in the so-called "wisdom" of this committee, they put the onus on the banks to pay the transportation charges on silver coin sent out through the country. The banks all over the country are complaining. I opposed this change, and have for nine years done so. Is it not the height of wisdom to relieve the banks and the people of the burden of having to pay the transportation charges on that money by having as many mints as we can, of course economically operated and wisely located and administered, to lessen the oppressive rates of the express companies? With the law repealed which provided for the free transportation of the silver dollars and small coins the gentleman now wants to smother the mint at New Orleans that is to supply the South and Southwest and our Panama demand; yet I understand he voted a few moments ago to continue the mint at Denver. So did I. A healthy public policy demands that that mint at San Francisco should be maintained, and if that is so, then certainly we ought to continue this mint at New Orleans, at the very head of the Panama Canal, where the Government will send its money by the shipload, practically, for years to come—yea, long after we have erected a shaft almost as high as the clouds and as white as alabaster in memory of the impartial and distinguished Chairman of the committee, who stands smiling, with gavel in hand, ready to call me down.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] to strike out the paragraph providing appropriation for the New Orleans mint and to reduce that establishment to a mere assay office is by no means a new one. Similar motions have been made time and again on the floor of this House. Yet in every Congress since I have had the honor to be here they have been rejected, and when on one occasion this House refused to do so, the Senate restored the provision and it was accepted here. It is true that since the final coinage of the bullion purchased under the Sherman law the work of that mint has diminished considerably, yet a great deal has been done, as the report will show. A great deal of bullion comes to that mint from some of the Central and South American States, from Mexico, and elsewhere, and as it is the only mint in the South affording facilities to its tributaries, the purpose of the Appropriations Committee in incorporating it in this bill ought to be sustained. I see no reason why the magnificent machinery which has been installed there, and which does its work more cheaply, I have no hesitation in asserting, than almost any other mint in this country, should not be operated.

The silver and gold from this mint at New Orleans can be distributed at a much cheaper cost than any other mint in this country. At present, while the operations may not be as extensive or as large as in some other mints, I think it is due to the South and that section of the country to maintain the only establishment of the kind that they have. The same arguments that have been made here to-day have been made ever since I have been in Congress and in the years prior to it.

This mint was established in 1835, and since that period, with few intermissions, has usefully contributed to the coinage of our metallic money.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEYER. Certainly.

Mr. SOUTHARD. If we have a superfluity of mints, how long would the gentleman think we ought to maintain a mint which employs fifty-one people, which earns only about $2,000, and the total coinage of which only amounts to about $2,000,000 a year?

Mr. MEYER. I do not think these figures apply to the establishment in question—its work during the past few years shows a far greater aggregate than this. Further, I beg to call the gentleman's attention to his own bill and report in which he recommends this mint as one of those to coin the subsidiary coins and nickels—how can this be done if abolished?

Indeed, in my judgment, we ought to maintain such a mint as long as there is any work for it to do. Some years perhaps, it may not be as remunerative as others. As has been said by the gentleman who preceded me, the completion of the construction of the Panama Canal will place us in closer intercourse with the Central American states, and in many of these our citizens have been given mining concessions, and in a short time they expect to produce a large quantity of gold and silver, which will most readily find its way to the Gulf cities.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Is it not a fact that the most of the metal required to keep it running is shipped from Omaha, or from up in that locality, at the expense of the Government?

Mr. MEYER. The trade with the South American republics, with the West Indies, and above all with Mexico, is to us a matter of gravest consequence. New Orleans is the nearest large city to grasp this trade. Her connections by rail and steamer, both inland and with the countries lying south of her, are superior. The influx of the precious metals from these countries should be encouraged, and in answer to the gentleman's question I will say I find that the greater part of the metal used has been shipped to the New Orleans mint from Colombia, Honduras, Nicaragua, and some other South American states during the last year. It is quite likely that the volume of that will increase.

Now, it has been stated with some force and truth that we could do all the coinage required at this time in fewer mints. That may be true. The mint in Philadelphia might be able, perhaps, to do it all for the present year, possibly for some years to come; but that is no good reason why the mints at San Francisco, Denver, and New Orleans should be abolished and all the work concentrated at that one place. It is not consistent with the policy which we should pursue in this country, and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it would be unfair and unpatriotic to abolish this institution when there are others that are just as little needed that are to be continued.

Indeed, if we had no mint at New Orleans, it would be our duty to establish one capable of meeting all the wants for a commerce which is growing daily to a degree surpassing every other nation.

To sum up briefly, I urge the reasons why the New Orleans mint should be maintained to be—

First. It is the only mint south of Mason and Dixon's line.

Second. It is a distributing point for the South and Southwest by numerous railroads and a grand water system, and distributed at a smaller cost to the Government than any other.

Third. Its workmanship compares favorably with the other mints, and its coinage is as economical, and frequently more so.

Fourth. It is central to a large silver-using section of the Union.

Fifth. The building and square of ground were a donation from the city of New Orleans to the General Government, to be used as a mint, and as such has been regarded for over seventy years as a fixed public institution.

Sixth. With the enactment into law of the bill introduced and favorably reported by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD], chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, authorizing the coinage of subsidiary coins and nickels by this mint, it operations will necessarily be much enlarged and demonstrate again its usefulness as a permanent institution. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For incidental and contingent expenses, including new machinery and repairs, expenses annual assay commission, melters' and refiners' wastage, and loss on sale of sweeps arising from the manufacture of ingots for coinage, and wastage and loss on sale of coiners' sweeps, and purchase not exceeding $500 in value of specimen coins and ores for the cabinet of the mint, $75,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire of the gentleman having the bill in charge if the Committee on Appropriations did not go carefully into the question of the amount necessary to be appropriated to carry on the mints of the country?

Mr. LITTAUER. We certainly did.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then does not the gentleman think that inasmuch as the amount provided in this bill for Denver has been increased by $75,000 it would be proper to reduce the amount for Philadelphia by $75,000?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not, and for this reason: I believe it should be left with the Director of the Mint to spend the money for wages for workmen carrying on the coinage where he believes it can be done at the best advantage. I do not believe there will be in the year 1906-7 enough work to take up more than two-thirds of the amount appropriated.

Mr. JOHNSON. This money is appropriated in a lump sum?

Mr. LITTAUER. A lump sum to be paid out for work actually performed for per diem wages.

Mr. JOHNSON. And if they have not work enough to use up the money, the unused fund will lapse into the Treasury?

Mr. LITTAUER. It will lapse back into the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For wages of workmen and adjusters, and not exceeding $57,500 for other clerks and employees, $150,000.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 71, line 16, strike out the words "thirty-seven" and "five hundred" and insert in lieu thereof, before the word "thousand," the word "forty."

In line 17 strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "sixty-five."

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I desire only to say that the committee has seen fit in this item to cut down the estimates for the mint in San Francisco $15,000 for adjusters, coiners, and workmen. I just desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that no cut has been made in the estimate of the coiners, adjusters, and workmen for the mint at Philadelphia. Yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania, a day or two ago, admitted that the mint in Philadelphia was not running. The mint in San Francisco is running and has plenty of bullion to run on during the whole of the year, and I hope that the committee will amend this bill in accordance with the amendments I have offered, so as to meet the estimates of the Director of the Mint.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, the amendments offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] are in accordance with the estimate by the Director of the Mint for provision for the coming year. The appropriation for the current year was $10,000 more than the gentleman proposes in his amendment. The appropriation for the mint at Philadelphia was reduced from $450,000 to $400,000, and in addition thereto we were advised that during the present year, when $450,000 was allowed for Philadelphia, the workmen had to be laid off for two months. With an appropriation of $400,000 they probably would have to be laid off three months. We felt, under such circumstances at Philadelphia, that there should be a proper reduction also at San Francisco and at Denver. We felt that the reduction of the estimates from $175,000 to $165,000 was hardly a proper proportion and recommended a sum that we felt was liberal and fair and a sum that we believe as large or even larger than could be expended for the coinage that would take place during the coming year.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the Book of Estimates shows that the estimate for the Philadelphia mint for this year was $400,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. That is for next year.

Mr. KAHN. And that the appropriation for last year, closing with the 30th of June of this year, was $450,000. In other words, the Director of the Mint estimates that $400,000 would be required this year, and the committee in the bill appropriated the $400,000. In a speech in this House a few days ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in speaking of the Philadelphia mint, admitted they were not working there with a full force of men, admitted that they had practically nothing to do. The mint in San Francisco is not in that condition. The mint at San Francisco is running with a full force of men.

Mr. LITTAUER. Why is it not in that condition?

Mr. KAHN. Because they have the gold bullion there to coin.

Mr. LITTAUER. That gold bullion can be sent to Philadelphia just as well as it can be used in San Francisco. Operations are going on at San Francisco simply because the Director of the Mint declares such should be the case.

Mr. KAHN. Not at all. San Francisco is closer to the Alaskan gold fields and to the gold fields of the world, and the gold naturally drifts to San Francisco.

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, it does not have to be coined there.

Mr. KAHN. It should be, because it is closer. Otherwise it probably would go into other countries altogether. It might be sent into Canada and sent across the country and coined in London.

Mr. LITTAUER. You could ship the bullion east just as well as you could ship the coin east.

Mr. KAHN. That would be an expense to the producer of the bullion.

Mr. LITTAUER. Not at all; the Government pays that expense.

Mr. KAHN. I do not so understand it at all.

Mr. LITTAUER. And I am positive of the fact.

Mr. KAHN. Nevertheless the committee has not seen fit to reduce the estimates in Philadelphia, and it has seen fit to reduce them in San Francisco. There is no reason for the reduction of the estimates in San Francisco, and I hope the amendments will pass.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendments offered by the gentleman from California will be considered [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KAHN) there were—ayes 24, noes 44.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assay office at Helena, Mont.: For assayer in charge, $2,250; melter, clerk, $1,800; clerk, $1,400; in all, $5,450.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JOHNSON. To offer an amendment to that paragraph. I move to strike out, in lines 24 and 25, page 72, the words "for assayer in charge, $2,250."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes. I see in the evidence taken before the Committee on Appropriations that the so-called "assayer" is not in fact an assayer.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is not that the evidence with reference to Boise, Idaho? Is the gentleman not mistaken in the place?

Mr. JOHNSON. No. That testimony came out in the Boise case, but the appropriation bill has dropped the assayer at that office. This is the first assay office where the assayer has been provided for. The testimony of the Director of the Mint is to the effect that the chief clerk was really the man in charge, the responsible man, the man who really was the assayer. He says that the person who wears that title is appointed by the President, and is such gentleman as some Representative or Senator may want to provide a position for.

In other words, the so-called assayer is an ornamental gentleman who does not do any assaying, but his subordinate, chief clerk, or assistant, by whatever title he is called, is the man who does the work. I see the Committee on Appropriations very wisely at these other assay offices which we have just passed have provided that the chief clerk or assistant assayer shall be a melter and the man in charge. In other words, you have dispensed with the office of the assayer, as such, at all these other offices.

Mr. LITTAUER. I hardly think that part of the gentleman's statement is correct. There is an assayer at Charlotte, N. C.——

Mr. JOHNSON. He is something else. He is an assayer and melter. In other words, he is the first man and the second man, too. If you had provided an assayer simply the second man there would have been called a melter; but you make one man fill both places. This is the first place that the committee have provided for an assayer simply and the Director of the Mint states, on page 305 of the testimony, that these men are merely ornamental gentlemen appointed at the instance of some Representative or Senator, and that the next man below them really does the work.

Mr. LITTAUER. And that was a general remark that applied to all these assay offices.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think so.

Mr. LITTAUER. But the gentleman is mistaken, I think, in one statement, and that is this: Where there are other duties in connection such duties may call for a practical man. Now, then, look at the item for assay office at Boise, Idaho. For assayer, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $2,000. Now, that individual was the very one toward whom the remarks of the Director of the Mint were directed, to that very individual who also performs the duties of melter.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand; but if the gentleman please, the Director of the Mint makes a statement on page 305 which bears out my statement. It is true that you were interrogating him about that particular office.

Mr. LITTAUER. And the particular man.

Mr. JOHNSON. But he stated the broad proposition that the men who wore the title not only at that office, but at all of them, were simply ornamental gentlemen, or language to that effect.

Mr. LITTAUER. I suppose it applied to every assay office where the head man is not a practical working assayer, but the second or third official, considered by the amount of compensation paid; but the head of the establishment is the responsible man. He, I believe, is a Presidential appointee, and he is responsible for whatever takes place there even though his title be a wrong one.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Have you not met the difficulty at these other assay offices by simply making the head man a melter?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; that does not change the status of matters at all. That man called an "assayer," who shall also perform the duties of melter, I do not believe performs any such work as head of the institution, because you will bear in mind that all these other assay offices, beginning with Boise, Idaho, which has an assayer who shall perform the duties of melter; next at Charlotte, N. C., assayer and melter; next at Deadwood, assayer in charge, who shall perform the duties of melter; next at Helena, assayer in charge; but the remark of the Director of the Mint, referred to by the gentleman from South Carolina, on page 305, contains this: "The man who wears the title of assayer is not the assayer in any of these offices." This is plural and covers all offices to which I referred. Well, it seems that Helena is the only place where this assayer, or the man who carries the title of assayer, has not some other duty to perform, according to the designation of the statute.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, then, as a matter of fact——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a minute more, because this is a business proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to continue his remarks for five minutes.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the debate on this paragraph end in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that debate be concluded on this paragraph in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to ask the gentleman from New York a question before he takes his seat. Is not the man who is designated as chief clerk, on page 73, the man who does the work at that Helena office?

Mr. LITTAUER. I think that is so, but they have a chief clerk and clerk at Deadwood, just the same as the assistant assayer at Charlotte, N. C., where the smallest business of any assay office is carried and which has the same employees as Boise and all these places. The head of the office does not do the work.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does not the gentleman think it is time for us to knock out some of these useless officers?

Mr. LITTAUER. The question is whether they are useless. They are the responsible heads, and if we take out one we ought to take them all out.

Mr. JOHNSON. It seems to me that we ought to make the man who has some work to perform the responsible head.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is about the same way where any Government work is carried on; it seems to be administered as economically as any of these offices.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Director of the Mint shows very clearly that these gentlemen have not much to do.

Mr. LITTAUER. But they do more business at the Helena office than either the Deadwood or other offices.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I would like to ask the gentleman why he moves to strike out the Helena office and not apply it to the smaller offices.

Mr. JOHNSON. I made the motion at the first office that provided an assayer, because the testimony went to show that the men who wear that title do no work.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. But the gentleman will remember that the Helena, Mont., office is probably the second largest office in the United States. Nearly $5,000,000 in gold went to that assay office in the last year, besides a large quantity of the gold coming in from the Klondike.

Mr. LITTAUER. About twenty times as much as the Charlotte, N. C., assay office.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am simply trying to get rid of officers that the Director of the Mint says have nothing to do. That is all there is about it.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. But I would say to the gentleman, by explanation, that I am reliably informed that the Helena office does twenty times the amount of work that is done at the Charlotte, N. C., office.

Mr. JOHNSON. No use talking to me about Charlotte—that is not my baby.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I will say to the gentleman that the Helena, Mont., office is mine [laughter], and I hope that the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assay office at St. Louis, Mo.: For assayer in charge, $2,000; clerk, $1,000; in all, $3,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "for assayer in charge, $2,000."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 74, lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "for assayer in charge, $2,000."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I have already stated, in relation to the Helena, Mont., office, the reason why this officer ought to be taken out of this bill. It is simply some gentleman who wears the title and draws the salary who has nothing to do.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I want to say this is my baby [laughter], and the argument made by the gentleman from South Carolina with respect to the assayer in Helena, Mont., does not apply to the assayer in St. Louis. He is an assayer in fact. He does the work. He is there from morning to night. He is charged with the hundreds and thousands of dollars' worth of valuable material that is being brought to that assay office, and he is responsible for every cent and every dollar of it. He has no assistant; he has to do the work himself. As the gentleman will find, if he will read the next line of this bill, there is no one to assist him except a clerk and workman and a janitor; and, in fact, the workman is the janitor.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, with respect to this item, that St. Louis is geographically so located that an assay office is an absolute necessity. Of the largest cities in the country, St. Louis is nearer to the gold fields than any other. Its business, if you permit me to say so, has increased 500 per cent during the last four years. Ever since it has become generally known that there is an assay office in St. Louis—for it has not been known until recently—business has increased phenomenally, and there is good prospect that within a very few years the St. Louis office will rank amongst the biggest and largest in the country.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I interrupt the gentleman? The gentleman has made a very interesting talk. I want to say to him I am heartily in favor of paying people who work. The gentleman has assured this House that the assayer in that particular office earns his salary. That being so, I am willing, with the permission of the committee, to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Surgeon-General: For chief clerk, $2,000; law clerk, $2,000; thirteen clerks of class 4; eleven clerks of class 3; twenty-six clerks of class 2; thirty-two clerks of class 1; ten clerks, at $1,000 each; anatomist, $1,600; engineer, $1,400; assistant engineer, for night duty, $900; two firemen; skilled mechanic, $1,000; twelve assistant messengers; three watchmen; superintendent of building (Army Medical Museum and library), $250; six laborers; chemist, $2,088; principal assistant librarian, $2,088; pathologist, $1,800; microscopist, $1,800; assistant librarian, $1,800; four charwomen; in all, $161,686.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to ask the gentleman what in the world they want of a law clerk in the office of the Surgeon-General of the Army?

Mr. LITTAUER. There is a considerable amount of testimony in the hearings on that topic.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have read that.

Mr. LITTAUER. We were impressed with the fact that the testimony showed——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Did you find that testimony convincing?

Mr. LITTAUER. Sufficiently to induce us to increase the salary of an $1,800 clerk to $2,000. This clerk devotes his time, in large part, to the solution of law questions and the determination of whether or not contracts are properly drawn. We thought the increase of $200 was proper and that the man's services were worth it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think the office of the Surgeon-General is as efficiently administered as any that I know of in any of the Departments of the Government, but I do not believe this is dealing frankly with the House or with the country. They do not need a law clerk in such an office as that, and if they want to increase the compensation of any employee of the office, I believe it would be better to be frank about it and say that that is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. We understood clearly that it was to increase the salary of a clerk from $1,800 to $2,000, and the reason for it is given in the words of the Surgeon-General:

I have a most valuable man, who has been there for a number of years, and who has charge of the legal propositions and questions about the expenditure of appropriations and the bills that come there, whether or not they are chargeable to an appropriation. He is very conversant with the decisions of the Comptroller.

Then later on I asked him:

Is he not really more of a contract clerk than a law clerk?

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is what he seems to be.

Mr. LITTAUER. The Surgeon-General answers:

You might call him that. There are questions in connection with laundry work. Our general appropriation pays for laundry work at posts, and there are questions constantly arising. I can not go into the minutiæ, but I know he seems to be working on questions of that kind, which we take to be law questions, all the time.

The items submitted with reference to that office generally call for a reduction rather than an increase.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Would it not be just as proper to call this man a "laundry clerk" as to call him a "law clerk?" [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, no; I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the formal amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Bureau of Insular Affairs: For chief clerk, $2,000; eight clerks of class 4; three clerks of class 3; eight clerks of class 2; fifteen clerks of class 1; thirteen clerks, at $1,000 each; fourteen clerks, at $900 each; two messengers; two assistant messengers; five laborers; two charwomen; in all, $82,900.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 87, in line 10, after the word "for" insert "law officer, $4,500."

In line 15, strike out "eighty-two thousand nine" and insert "eighty-seven thousand four."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. The current law carries provision for this law officer at $4,500. He has been connected with the Bureau of Insular Affairs at that compensation for many years.

The Secretary of War stated that he was using this law officer in part for questions in connection with isthmian canal affairs, and the problem before the committee was how we should divide his salary; whether part of it should not be chargeable to the isthmian canal and part of it to the work of the law officer of the Bureau of Insular Affairs. We left out the provision in this bill, but the Secretary of War wrote that the services of this man were essential to him, and that he felt with the number of irons he had in the fire at this time that we should continue this law officer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where is the man provided for now?

Mr. LITTAUER. In the current law, in this very place, under the Bureau of Insular Affairs. He has been there for many years past. Judge Magoon, now an Isthmian Canal Commissioner, formerly occupied the position.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Who is the law officer now?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not know the law officer's name.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Does this law officer draw any other salary from the Government except this?

Mr. LITTAUER. I am quite positive he does not.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. All he gets is provided in this particular place.

Mr. LITTAUER. As far as I know, and I believe it can be stated as a fact that he only draws $4,500, but he does much work for the Secretary of War in connection with isthmian affairs.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But draws no salary for that?

Mr. LITTAUER. None at all. The question with us was how we could divide the salary, paying part of the compensation out of the isthmian canal fund and part out of this, and we thought the smoothest way and possibly the most satisfactory way was to make the provision in this place as it had been made before.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. What change do you make?

Mr. LITTAUER. We reinstate the same provision that is in the current appropriation bill for the law officer in the Bureau of Insular Affairs, the compensation being the same as in the current law, $4,500.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is this man there to advise the present Secretary of War on questions of law?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman think that a man who is a possible candidate for the Supreme Court of the United States needs the advice of a law officer?

Mr. LITTAUER. Unquestionably, in order to have such matters examined into thoroughly and presented to him for determination.

Mr. MANN. He will get more advice on law questions after he goes on the Supreme bench than he gets now. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAY. I merely reserved the point of order for an explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Virginia does not make the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For postage stamps for the War Department and its bureaus, as required under the Postal Union, to prepay postage on matters addressed to the Postal Union countries, $500.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if the general provision, usually found in appropriation bills, as to the purchases of supplies in excess of $200 shall be advertised, is in this bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. There is a provision in the Army bill, I believe, that permits the purchase of supplies up to a certain amount without advertising.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am familiar with that provision, but I want to know if that law applies to the appropriations carried in this bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. It does not. For all the little expenses of the Department here in Washington purchases can only be made after proper advertisement, submission of proposals, etc., although it was suggested by the Assistant Secretary that we should give him that privilege to purchase articles up to the value of $100 without advertisement we did not see fit to incorporate that provision in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

Office of the Secretary: For compensation of the Secretary of the Interior, $8,000; First Assistant Secretary, $4,500, and for additional compensation while the office is held by the present incumbent, $1,500; Assistant Secretary, $4,500; chief clerk, $2,500, and $500 additional as superintendent of the Patent Office building and other buildings of the Department of the Interior; additional to one member of board of pension appeals, acting as chief of the board, $500; nine members of a board of pension appeals, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, at $2,000 each; twelve additional members of the board of pension appeals, to be selected and appointed by the Secretary of the Interior from persons not now or heretofore employed in the Pension Office and without compliance with the conditions prescribed by the act entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service," approved January 16, 1883, for the fiscal year 1907, at the end of which year said employments shall cease, at $2,000 each; three additional members of said board of pension appeals, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior and to be selected from the force of the Pension Office, at $2,000 each; special land inspector, connected with the administration of the public-land service, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior and to be subject to his direction $2,500; five special inspectors, Department of the Interior, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior and to be subject to his direction, at $2,500 each; custodian, who shall give bond in such sum as the Secretary of the Interior may determine, $2,100; seven clerks, chiefs of division, at $2,250 each, one of whom shall be disbursing clerk; four clerks, at $2,000 each; private secretary to the Secretary of the Interior, $2,500; sixteen clerks of class 4; fourteen clerks of class 3; twenty-five clerks of class 2; thirty-six clerks of class 1, two of whom shall be stenographers or typewriters; returning office clerk, $1,200; female clerk, to be designated by the President, to sign land patents, $1,200; six clerks, at $1,000 each; one clerk, $900; twelve copyists; two copyists or typewriters, at $900 each; switchboard telephone operator; nine messengers; seven assistant messengers; eighteen laborers; two skilled mechanics, one at $900 and one at $720; two carpenters, at $900 each; plumber, $900; electrician, $1,000; one laborer, $600; six laborers, $480 each; one packer, $660; two conductors of elevator, at $720 each; four charwomen; captain of the watch, $1,200; forty watchmen; additional to two watchmen acting as lieutenants of watchmen, at $120 each; engineer, $1,200; assistant engineer, $1,000; seven firemen; one clerk, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, to sign, under the direction of the Secretary, in his name and for him, his approval of all tribal deeds to allottees and deeds for town lots made and executed according to law for any of the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians in the Indian Territory, $1,200; in all, $342,390.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, on page 108, line 14, I move to strike out the word "two;" so that it will read "three hundred and forty thousand three hundred and ninety dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

General Land Office: For the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $5,000; Assistant Commissioner, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall be authorized to sign such letters, papers, and documents and to perform such other duties as may be directed by the Commissioner, and shall act as Commissioner in the absence of that officer or in case of a vacancy in the office of Commissioner, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,500; chief law clerk, $2,500; two law clerks, at $2,200 each; three inspectors of surveys general and district land offices, at $2,000 each; recorder, $2,000; eleven chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; two law examiners, at $2,000 each; ten principal examiners of land claims and contests, at $2,000 each; two examiners of mineral claims and contests, at $2,000 each; thirty-seven clerks of class 4; sixty-four clerks of class 3; sixty-seven clerks of class 2; sixty-nine clerks of class 1; fifty-seven clerks, $1,000 each; sixty copyists; two messengers; ten assistant messengers; six skilled laborers, who may act as assistant messengers when required, at $660 each; sixteen laborers; one laborer, $480; one packer, $720; one depositary acting for the Commissioner as receiver of public moneys and also as confidential secretary, $2,000; librarian for the law library of the General Land Office, to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior wholly with reference to his special fitness for such work, $1,000; in all, $560,100.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There is evidently an increase of salaries and officers in the General Land Office, not only an increase in salaries but an increase in the number of clerks. Here is a law clerk, $2,500. I know this would have been subject to a point of order but for the extraordinary performance we had this morning in having an extraordinary rule applied to an ordinary appropriation bill. I think more information is due the House than is given in the very meager report made on this subject by the committee as to why the Appropriations Committee felt called upon to make this increase—not only an increase in the number of clerks, but an increase in the larger salaries amounting to as high as $2,500.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would state that the provisions for the General Land Office include these changes from current law: The chief clerk's salary is made $2,500, an increase of $250. The chief law clerk, at $2,500, is added to the force, and four copyists are stricken out.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; you provide for the copyists.

Mr. LITTAUER. We provide for sixty copyists, but the current law provides for sixty-four. The necessity for the chief law clerk is due to the fact that the two law clerks now provided for are wholly occupied in daily examination of cases involving questions of law regularly arising in the transaction of the ordinary business coming before the office on appeal from the various local land offices and otherwise.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman is it not a fact that these offices are created and that the present officers, the clerks, are to be advanced at once into these new places?

Mr. LITTAUER. I did not quite hear what the gentleman said.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not the purpose of this bill, to be plain about it, to provide places wherein men who now perform these duties at lower salaries are to be advanced to these positions with a higher salary?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not think that that would apply in this particular case. I believe that the law clerks already provided for would remain where they are, and that there would be a chief law clerk who would attend to the special questions coming before the Department and who ought to be entitled to a salary of $2,500.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that this particular clerk is performing the duties of chief law clerk of the law division of the Land Office. It is for the purpose of giving him a legal designation that this change is made. He is performing the duties of reviewing officer, reviewing the decisions of the other law clerks, and to that extent relieves the Assistant Commissioner. He is the chief law clerk and has greater responsibilities and has to do more work than any other law clerk in the whole division.

Mr. BARTLETT. And generally runs the Land Office.

Mr. TAWNEY. His designation was changed and his salary was increased.

Mr. BURLESON. And the necessity for it was advocated by the Department officials.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand. I thought I would find out where it was. Now, then, it is a fact that this increase of salary is intended for some particular man?

Mr. TAWNEY. Some particular man?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; some particular man who is now working at a less salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of answering the gentleman. It is not for any particular man, but it is for the man who fills this office either now or hereafter who is required to discharge the duties of chief clerk of the law division of the Land Office. That is for whose benefit this increase is made. It is made for the benefit of the man who performs the duties, whoever he may be. There is such a distinction between the duties performed by this officer and the other law clerks in the Department as entitles him to greater remuneration. His duties are more onerous and his responsibilities greater. He is the man who stands between the law division in the reviewing of all opinions and decisions rendered and the Assistant Commissioner of the Land Office.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. In view of the fact that the chief clerks in the War Department and the Navy Department and all the other bureaus are getting $2,000, are not the gentlemen on the committee apprehensive that at the very next session of this Congress the heads of these Departments will be down upon them, asking that their chief clerks be raised to $2,500?

Mr. LITTAUER. That is very true. We find that when we raise one all the rest want to go up.

Mr. JOHNSON. Because they do not know any way of equalizing salaries except to put them up.

Mr. LITTAUER. Up to the top level; that is right.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, as sure as you make this clerk's salary—I don't know whether he is worth that or not—but as sure as you make his salary $2,500 a year the other chief clerks will be here at the next session of Congress and the next, claiming that their duties are just as arduous, and that unless you give them $2,500 there is an inequality.

Mr. LITTAUER. This was one of the last matters passed upon by the Committee on Appropriations before reporting this bill. The Assistant Commissioner of the Land Office appeared before us, detailed the services of this man, and stated they were rather extraordinary. He is a particularly well-fitted official. He not only did the ordinary work of chief clerk in overlooking the other clerks, but he also did some of this work of reviewing the work that came in from the field from the men connected with the service in the field, and a particularly strong appeal was made by the General Land Office to have this man's service recognized by an addition of $500.

Mr. JOHNSON. And that strong appeal will be followed up by an equally strong appeal from other divisions and bureaus.

Mr. TAWNEY. The appropriation bill for 1892 and 1893 carried this salary at $2,500, $250 more than is provided for in this bill.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, ought not this whole business of employing law clerks in these Departments to be changed, and ought not the Attorney-General's Office or the Department of Justice to have control of all the law business, and ought not everyone of these bureaus and subbureaus——

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that would work well in practice at all.

Mr. PALMER. Well, now you have got about 150 or 200 law clerks scattered around in these bureaus, and everyone of them is a law unto himself.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; and when we have agents of the Department of Justice in the various departments, solicitor's offices, we find a large force gradually necessary and more and more law business to be transacted. The Department of Justice has no supervision whatever over the work they perform.

Mr. PALMER. Would it not be far better for the Department of Justice to have complete supervision over all of this work, and whenever any Department of the Government desires to have information on any question of law ought not it to be referred to the Department of Justice, so that there would be some kind of a harmonious ruling? Now you have 150 law clerks, so called, some of them lawyers and some of them laundry clerks, as I understand. Of course their views of the law are very diverse.

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, these law clerks that the gentleman refers to are really contract clerks—clerks that pass upon contracts entered into by the Departments and the bureaus, to determine that they are in proper form and to arrange for the ordinary contracts made for purchases, and so on.

Mr. PALMER. They pass upon the questions of law, do they not?

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, they pass upon questions of law and formulate contracts.

Mr. PALMER. There is nobody responsible for their decision except the clerks themselves?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, may I say to my colleague that this law clerk is particularly needed here, and used in connection with the contracts between the Government and the Indians?

Mr. PALMER. I am not making any criticism of this particular office, but I am saying that the whole system, it seems to me, is upside down. The Department of Justice ought to have control of all these matters. We ought to have a homogeneous and harmonious system, by which the head of some Department would be responsible for the decisions that are made. Now you have about 150 sources from which decisions come, and some of them are law and some of them are not law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me say to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, that perhaps there are a thousand small legal questions arising in the different Departments in a week. If you should send all those up to the Department of Justice they would have to have five or six hundred more law clerks to answer these little detail departmental legal questions which come up in the Departments of the Government. That would blockade and handicap the Department of Justice to the extent that they could do no work at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, who has the floor? I believe I have the floor. I would like to ask the gentleman which one of these clerks is new, then?

Mr. LITTAUER. Which is that?

Mr. BARTLETT. Law clerks, General Land Office.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is the chief law clerk that is new. There are four law clerks in the office under current law.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman ought to read the bill. In line 16, "chief law clerk, $2,500," and then "chief law clerk, $2,500." Which one is new?

Mr. LITTAUER. The chief law clerk, $2,500, is new, and two law clerks at $2,200 each are in the current law, and also below that two law examiners, at $2,000 each.

Mr. BARTLETT. But the gentleman has not answered my question yet. In line 16, "chief law clerk, $2,500?"

Mr. LITTAUER. That is new.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then "chief law clerk, $2,500." Is that new?

Mr. LITTAUER. That is new.

Mr. BARTLETT. Both of them?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; there is a chief clerk, at $2,500, and the other is a chief law clerk.

Mr. BARTLETT. All right; but the chief law clerk is new?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What is it the gentleman from Wyoming wishes to ask?

Mr. MONDELL. I wish to discuss the matter under discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This, to my mind, is a very important matter, and this chief law clerk is badly needed in the General Land Office. It should be remembered that in the first instance the law officers of the General Land Office pass upon legal questions connected with every land entry in the United States, that these men pass upon in the course of a year probably more cases of importance to individual settlers on the public domain and to individual citizens than any other class of law clerks or law examiners or law officials of any department of the Government. The General Land Office has now two law clerks and two law examiners. Matters coming from the various divisions of the General Land Office—swamp-land division, preemption division, homestead division, contest division—passed upon and initialed in those divisions, come to the law clerks and are passed upon by them before going to the Commissioner or Assistant Commissioner, as the case may be.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman who appoints these clerks?

Mr. MONDELL. Why, they are appointed under civil service.

Mr. PALMER. To whom do they report? Who is responsible for their decisions?

Mr. MONDELL. Their decisions are passed upon finally by the Assistant Commissioner or Commissioner.

Mr. PALMER. Then the Department of Justice of the United States has nothing to do with them?

Mr. MONDELL. The Department of Justice has nothing to do with them and can not have anything to do with them.

Mr. PALMER. Do you not think it would be better for the Department of Justice to be responsible for all the law that is peddled out in these Departments?

Mr. MONDELL. Why, Mr. Chairman, it would be utterly impossible for the Department of Justice, without revolutionizing the system that we adopted at the foundation of the Government, to pass upon these questions relative to the rights of entrymen that have always been passed upon by the officials of the General Land Office. They pass through the divisions of the General Land Office to these law examiners; are reviewed by them; they are taken to the Commissioner or Assistant Commissioner, and, then, if the entryman is not satisfied, he may appeal to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. PALMER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that these lawyers were appointed by the Civil Service Commission, or that they take a civil-service examination?

Mr. MONDELL. They are appointed under civil-service rules, I understand.

Mr. PALMER. Do you understand that a lawyer has to submit himself to a civil-service examination before he can get an appointment in one of these bureaus?

Mr. MONDELL. I am not responsible for the civil-service law; it is on the statute books.

Mr. PALMER. I understand the gentleman perfectly as to that. I am only asking, as a matter of fact, about the appointment of these lawyers. You say that they are appointed under the civil-service rules. I am asking you if a lawyer must submit himself to an examination by the Civil Service Commission before he can get an appointment in one of these bureaus?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. He has.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand that to be the fact.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the gentleman to say that the clerks are not in any way under the Department of Justice that that has been the condition of things from the earliest times in this country. I want to know of him whether, if a party feels wronged by any action of the Land Office or anywhere else, he may not appeal on a legal question not only to the Secretary, as the head of that Department, but also to the Attorney-General and Department of Justice, and at last whether all of these officers are under the general direction of the Department of Justice?

Mr. MONDELL. That is a very large question, Mr. Chairman. The fact is that in the matter of settling titles to the public lands my understanding is that it has been held that there is no appeal in ordinary cases from the decision of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. KEIFER. But is there not now, under a ruling of the Department, where you may go, after a decision has been made by the Secretary of the Interior, and have the question passed upon by the Attorney-General?

Mr. MONDELL. I know of no such ruling.

Mr. LITTAUER. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BARTLETT. A parliamentary inquiry. This section is subject to amendment, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that it is.

The motion that the committee rise was then agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had further considered the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

OPENING KIOWA, COMANCHE, AND APACHE RESERVATION.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution to amend the bill (H. R. 431) to open for settlement 505,000 acres of land in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Reservation in Oklahoma Territory.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much to do it. After 5 o'clock, usually, the House is so thin and there are so few people here I have felt it right that no unanimous consent should be gotten after 5; and without waiting to hear what the bill is, so that I may not even appear to have opposed the bill, I shall object.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6216. An act granting an increase of pension to Stephen D. Hopkins;

H. J. Res. 127. Joint resolution to correct abuses in the public printing and to provide for the allotment of cost of certain documents and reports; and

H. J. Res. 128. Joint resolution to prevent unnecessary printing and binding and to correct evils in the present method of distribution of public documents.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 5211. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Snake River at or near Lewiston, Idaho;

S. 4833. An act to amend an act entitled "An act permitting the Washington Market Company to lay a conduit and pipes across Seventh street west," approved February 23, 1905;

S. 5204. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge or bridges across the Yellowstone River in Montana;

S. 5184. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River between Walworth and Dewey counties, in the State of South Dakota;

S. 4628. An act providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof; and

S. 4198. An act granting permission to Prof. Simon Newcomb, United States Navy, retired, to accept the decoration of the order "Pour le Mérite, für Wissenschaften und Kunste."

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 536. An act amending the act of August 3, 1892, chapter

911, entitled "An act fixing the fees of jurors and witnesses in the United States courts in certain States and Territories" (27 Stat. L., p. 347)—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REORGANIZATION OF THE CONSULAR SERVICE.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report on Senate bill 1345, in order that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The conference report and statement will be printed in the RECORD.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, reference was changed on House resolution 376 from the Committee on Claims to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On bill (H. R. 17412) for acquiring by condemnation for Government reservations certain triangles on Sixteenth street, in the city of Washington, from the Committee on the District of Columbia to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill (H. R. 11641) for the improvement of the public schools of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will have to object to unanimous consent.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. It is merely the reprint of a bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of St. Johns River, Florida—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting an estimate of appropriation for lighting Ambrose channel, New York Bay—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with a letter from the Acting Director of the Geological Survey, a draft of a bill for the lease of certain lands and the covering of the proceeds into the reclamation fund—to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Maurice River, New Jersey—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed, with accompanying illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GILLETT of California, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 2286) to confer jurisdiction upon the circuit court of the United States for the ninth circuit to determine in equity the rights of American citizens under the award of the Bering Sea arbitration of Paris and to render judgment thereon, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2674); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11273) to incorporate The National German-American Alliance, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2675); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GRONNA, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16954) providing for the reappraisement of certain suburban lots in the town site of Port Angeles, Wash., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2676); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. JENKINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the House resolution (H. Res. 375) requesting the Attorney-General to inform the House of name and date of every appointment made under the act of Congress to carry into effect the stipulations of article 7 of the treaty between the United States and Spain, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2677); which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FOSS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16858) to establish a naval militia and define its relations to the General Government, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2680); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. PRINCE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15675) for the relief of Harry A. Young, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2669); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SLAYDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13917) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Robert W. Liggett, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2670); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. PRINCE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 584) for the relief of David H. Moffat, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2672); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5842) to correct the military record of Charles F. Deisch, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2678); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MONDELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16521) directing the Secretary of the Interior to convey a certain parcel of land to Johnson County, Wyo., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2679); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Under clause 2, Rule XIII, adverse reports were delivered to the Clerk, and laid on the table, as follows:

Mr. PRINCE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 497) to authorize the President to revoke the order dismissing William T. Godwin, late first lieutenant, Tenth Infantry, United States Army, and to place the said William T. Godwin on the retired list with the rank of first lieutenant, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 2671); which said bill and report were ordered laid on the table.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS INTRODUCED.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BABCOCK: A bill (H. R. 17451) to amend section 653 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, relative to assessment life insurance companies and associations—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, a bill (H. R. 17452) to provide for payment of damages on account of changes in grade due to the elimination of grade crossings on the line of the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. PAYNE: A bill (H. R. 17453) for the withdrawal from bond, tax free, of domestic alcohol when rendered unfit for beverage or liquid medicinal uses by mixture with suitable denaturing materials—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GILL (by request): A bill (H. R. 17454) to amend the statutes relating to patents—to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. BUCKMAN: A bill (H. R. 17455) permitting the building of a dam across the Mississippi River at or near the village of Clearwater, Wright County, Minn.—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. RHODES: A bill (H. R. 17456) making appropriations for the improvement of the Mississippi River at Clearyville, Mo., and other points in Perry County, Mo.—to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River.

Also, a bill (H. R. 17457) making appropriations for the improvement of the Mississippi River at Hughs Landing, near Crystal City, Mo., and other points in Jefferson County, Mo.—to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River.

By Mr. BENNET of New York: A bill (H. R. 17458) to authorize the United States Government to participate in the international exposition to be held at Milan, Italy, during the year 1906, and to appropriate money in aid thereof—to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions.

By Mr. ANDREWS: A bill (H. R. 17459) to set apart certain lands in the Territory of New Mexico as a public park, to be known as the New Mexico Cliff Dwellers National Park, for the purpose of preserving the prehistoric caves and ruins and other works and relics therein—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 17460) to improve the grounds about the Federal building at Santa Fe, N. Mex.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 17461) to authorize an issue of bonds by the Territory of New Mexico for the enlargement of the Territorial Insane Asylum—to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 17462) to abolish the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SMITH of Texas: A bill (H. R. 17463) to provide for investigation of and report upon the medicinal and therapeutic value of the mineral waters at Mineral Wells, Tex.—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I present a memorial in the shape of a resolution adopted by the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas, in reference to the rate bill, and a letter from the attorney of the association giving a short history of that association and its purposes. I ask that the letter and memorial be read.

There being no objection, the letter and memorial were read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 29, 1906.

Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I present to you herewith a resolution of the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas, with the following suggestions:

The Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas is a Texas institution only in name. It embraces the cattle raisers to a great extent in all of the Territories and in a number of States like Kansas, Colorado, South Dakota, Montana, etc., and is the strongest organization of its kind in the world. Its members number nearly 2,000 and own over 4,000,000 cattle. Their vast interest arises from the fact that, beginning in 1887, the railroads, by concert of action, have in the four years next following so advanced rates on live stock from the great producing country of the Southwest that to-day it costs about $18 per car more to ship to any market or elsewhere to the North or East than it did in 1886, 1897, 1896, or on the average for ten years previous to 1899, and this has caused the live-stock shippers to pay a gross sum of over $10,000,000 in six years last past above what they would have paid on the basis of previous rates.

The last advances—March 5, 1903—have been held by the Commission to be unjust and unreasonable, and that amounts to over a million dollars per annum to the live-stock shipper from the Southwest. It affects not only Texas and the Southwestern States and Territories, but the States of Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan, which are stocking their feed lots with cattle raised in Texas and the Southwestern Territories, which they ship up as calves or yearlings. Even New York receives cattle to feed and fatten from Texas. It affects all of the range States, like Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, Utah, South Dakota, Wyoming, Montana, and Idaho, all of which receive much of their cattle from the Southwest breeding ground. The American National Live Stock Association has passed similar resolutions.

In this connection it may be truthfully said that the live-stock interests, which are coextensive with the farming interest in all these States, have been for years interested in demanding adequate legislation which would give them a fair show with the railroads in the struggle for existence. The Senate owes a duty to the country, and this is one of the demands for its performance.

No organization in this country possesses a membership of more conservative, intelligent, and reasonable men, and its leaders are among the foremost men of the Southwest.

Yours, very truly,

S. H. COWAN,
Attorney for the Association.

RESOLUTION RECOMMENDED BY THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Whereas the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas and the other live-stock associations of the West and many organizations of shippers throughout the country have for years petitioned Congress to so amend the interstate-commerce act that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to prescribe such rates, regulations, and practices to be observed by the railroads as will secure to the shippers just, fair, and reasonable rates, and will prevent undue discriminations and preferences and otherwise provide that the Commission's orders shall be made promptly effective; and

Whereas, through the various forces at work in behalf of the people's interests, the House of Representatives of the present Congress has passed the Hepburn bill with practical unanimity; and

Whereas, after due consideration of the provisions of that bill, this association considers that it meets the requirements which this association has been urging upon Congress; and

Whereas the great powers of the opposition to such legislation render it extremely difficult to secure such legislation and, as we are informed and believe, are now attempting to defeat the passage of this bill in the Senate of the United States by every subterfuge which it is possible for them to command by proposed amendments intended either for the purpose of preventing the passage of the bill or in other instances to render the bill valueless if it is passed; and

Whereas we believe it is a duty which the Senate of the United States owes the people to pass this legislation in the shape that the bill now is in order to make certain that the remedies provided by the bill will be enacted into law; and

Whereas if it shall appear after the law has been put into operation that it need amendment, Congress convenes again within eight months of this date and can then take up the matter of such amendments as may seem to be needful; and

Whereas if this course is not pursued there may be grave danger of the bill not being passed at all; and

Whereas we believe it to be our right to call upon our Senators from the various Western States in which the members of this association reside and do business, and particularly the Senators from the State of Texas, to urge them to consider our interests in this matter; and

Whereas the amount of the unjust rates which we are being compelled to pay for the want of an adequate law affording a remedy such as is provided by the Hepburn bill against such unreasonable rates is costing us millions of dollars: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas in annual convention assembled at Dallas, Tex., March 19 to 21, 1906. That we urgently request the Senate of the United States, and particularly our Senators from the State of Texas, to use their efforts and best endeavors to secure the passage of the Hepburn bill in the form in which the same has passed the House, with such minor corrections as may appear to be necessary, without an attempt to so amend it as to endanger its passage.

Adopted by the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas in convention assembled.

JNO. T. LYTLE, Secretary.

Mr. SCOTT. On the subject of the bill regulating the hours for the retention of cattle in cars I present a petition from the humane societies of my State. The petitioners ask that the petition may be printed in the RECORD. I make that request.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and to lie on the table, as follows:

[Our Fourfooted Friends, March, 1906.]

The opinion of Mr. E. H. Whitehead, of Denver, Colo., on the attempt to increase the time allowed by law to carry cattle without food, rest, or water is worth quoting. It comes from a man who has made careful observation. He says:

"In making investigations not less than fifty stockmen of all kinds, shippers, commission men, and railroad men have been interviewed, and without a single exception have admitted that twenty-eight hours is long enough. The statements of stockmen who favor the extension to thirty-six hours are unreliable, and often apparently designed to mislead. The whole matter of animal protection is regarded by them as a joke, and they do not feel the same responsibility for their statements as they would about other matters.

"Members of Congress and others are likely to be deceived by what are really absurd and often ludicrous misrepresentations; for instance, the statement to Secretary Wilson that cattle are now loaded loosely in cars, so that a third can lie down and rest all the time. Those who made this statement presumed on Secretary Wilson's lack of practical information and made him believe it, with the result that his Department issued an order 'based on this fact.' The Department has been the laughingstock of the West ever since, and especially of men who duped the Secretary into the error.

"The claim of stockmen that they should be the judges of what is best for stock, and that self-interest will insure right care of same, ought to be true, but as a fact the business is conducted on the penny-wise-and-pound-foolish principle. There is no other business in which brutality to animals and suffering so generally prevails. According to the census of 1900 the number of range cattle was 29,000,000. At the present time there are literally millions starving on the ranges. They will starve slowly until spring, and hundreds of thousands will die. This happens every year. Stockmen count regularly on a certain percentage of loss from starvation, thirst, and cold. If 5, 10, or 15 per cent starve to death there is still a margin of profit. Are the owners of stock the best judges of what is best?

"The statement of stockmen that transportation conditions are improved, railroads making larger, and therefore more comfortable, cars, provided with feed racks and to some extent with watering troughs, is untrue as applied to 90 per cent of the live-stock shipments west of the Missouri River. Larger cars do not conduce to the comfort of cattle, but rather the reverse, as more cattle are put in. Feed racks and watering troughs are not in the cars, and could not be used if they were. Range cattle are often driven long distances and then loaded for the journey without rest, food, or water. The reason why cattle are not fed and watered before being loaded on cars is to avoid making the floor slippery and harder for the animals to keep their feet on, as an animal once down, unless immediately gotten up, will be mutilated and perhaps destroyed. Food racks and watering troughs can not be used unless each animal has a separate stall. Few cattle will eat on the cars, and food is not so necessary as rest and water. Stock suffers most from fatigue, next from thirst, last from hunger. Cinders, sand, or common dirt are spread on the floor of the cars to help cattle keep their feet, and are not intended for cattle to lie on, as they can not lie down without mutilation."

Photographs in Mr. Whitehead's possession show the outside and inside of a palace stock car. Thirteen steers in this car were trampled to death—the paunches trampled into mere bags, horns knocked off, and eyes knocked out and ribs broken. The car had come 120 miles. Not being loaded tightly enough, in switching one animal fell or lay down and was immediately trampled and soon killed; there being more room, others soon fell and suffered the same fate. The only animals left alive, or not so badly injured as to need immediate killing when the car reached Denver, were those that kept their feet. This is what happens when they are not packed tight. This was one of the comfortable cars described by stockmen in which cattle can take turns in lying down on their soft beds, arising when refreshed and eating the good hay in the imaginary racks and drinking deep drafts of water from the imaginary troughs.

It must be insisted on that lying down, eating, and drinking on cars are impossible, except for race horses and pedigreed stock, where cost does not count. Cattle must be packed as tight as they can stand for their own protection. They can not be watered on cars, as their excrement befouls the water. They can not be made to face one way.

Individual members of stock associations have privately admitted that twenty-eight hours is long enough and too long for the poor, half-starved range stock. Any extension of the twenty-eight-hour law would be cruel and inhuman, and the time should be reduced rather than extended.

Mr. SCOTT. I have a communication here from a former mayor of Huntington, W. Va., who is now a resident of the Isle of Pines. I should like to have the paper read and have it go into the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest that matters relating to the treaty are certainly executive business. The paper can be presented in executive session, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SCOTT. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that it does not refer at all to the treaty. It refers to property rights.

Mr. LODGE. It is all connected with the treaty, I think. I have no desire to prevent it from being read, but I think it should be presented in executive session.

Mr. SCOTT. I will withdraw it and offer it in executive session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication is withdrawn.

A bill (H. R. 14592) to authorize the construction of two bridges across the Cumberland River at or near Nashville, Tenn.

LIGHTS ON BOATS AND RAFTS IN TOW.

Mr. FRYE. From the Committee on Commerce I am about to report several bills, and as it will take but a minute to pass each of them, and there being no possible objection, I shall ask for their present consideration. It has been recently decided by the circuit court that inspectors can not enforce the law so as to require lights on rafts in tow. The bills simply amend the existing law by adding the words "or in tow."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reports will be received.

Mr. FRYE. First, I report back from the Committee on Commerce, without amendment, the bill (S. 5385) to amend an act entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions upon certain harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States," approved June 7, 1897, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That clause "d" of article 9 of the act entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions upon certain harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States," approved June 7, 1897, be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting, after the word "river" and before the word "shall," the words "or in tow;" so that the same shall read as follows:

"Rafts or other water craft not herein provided for, navigating by hand power, horse power, or by the current of the river, or in tow, shall carry one or more good white lights, which shall be placed in such manner as shall be prescribed by the Board of Supervising Inspectors of Steam Vessels."

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. FRYE. Senate 5385. It simply inserts the words "or in tow."

Mr. CULBERSON. I was about to ask the Senator from Maine what connection it has with Senate bill 5384, which is to amend rule 12 of section 4233?

Mr. FRYE. That bill makes the same amendment. The circuit court has just held that the inspectors have no right to compel lights on these vessels. This is simply to give them the right to require white lights on rafts in tow.

Mr. CULBERSON. The bills are companion measures?

Mr. FRYE. Yes; there are three separate bills to correct the existing law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just read?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE. I report back from the Committee on Commerce without amendment the bill (S. 5384) to amend rule 12 of section 4233 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to lights on water craft, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend rule 12 of section 4233 of the Revised Statutes of the United States by inserting after the word "river" and before the word "or" the words "or in tow;" so as to read as follows:

Rule 12. Coal boats, trading boats, produce boats, canal boats, oyster boats, fishing boats, rafts, or other water craft navigating any bay, harbor, or river by hand power, horsepower, sail, or by the current of the river, or in tow, or which shall be anchored or moored in or near the channel or fairway of any bay, harbor, or river, and not otherwise provided for in these rules, shall carry one or more good white lights, which shall be placed in such manner as shall be prescribed by the Board of Supervising Inspectors of Steam Vessels.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE. From the Committee on Commerce, I report back without amendment the bill (S. 5386) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters," approved February 8, 1895, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend rule 10 of the act approved February 8, 1895, by inserting after the word "river" and before the word "or" the words "or in tow;" so as to read:

Rule 10. Produce boats, canal boats, fishing boats, rafts, or other water craft navigating any bay, harbor, or river by hand power, horse power, sail, or by the current of the river, or in tow, or which shall be anchored or moored in or near the channel or fairway of any bay, harbor, or river, and not otherwise provided for in these rules, shall carry one or more good white lights, which shall be placed in such manner as shall be prescribed by the Board of Supervising Inspectors of Steam Vessels.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HALE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE JOHN W. CRANFORD.

Mr. PLATT. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 11) for the publication of eulogies delivered in Congress on Hon. John W. Cranford, late a Representative in Congress, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs that the eulogies delivered in the Senate and House during the third session of the Fifty-fifth Congress on the late Hon. John W. Cranford, a Representative in Congress from the Fourth district of Texas, who died but a short time before the end of the Fifty-fifth Congress, and the eulogies on whose life and character were delivered in the Senate and House before the adjournment of said Congress, but for some unknown reason were never published and under the law can not now be published except by joint resolution, be published in the form and manner usually followed in the publication of eulogies in Congress on deceased Members, to the number of 1,000 copies to be distributed by the Representative from the First district of Texas and the regular number bound in the usual style for the family of the deceased. The usual number shall not be printed.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIFE-SAVING STATIONS ON COAST OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. PILES. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5027) providing for the establishment of three life-saving stations on the coast of Washington, between Cape Flattery and Grays Harbor, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish on the coast of Washington, between Cape Flattery and Grays Harbor, at such points as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend, three life-saving stations, or such less number for which suitable sites can be found.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to construct a telephone line from some point at or near Cape Flattery, State of Washington, along the coast line of the Pacific Ocean to some point on the north side of Grays Harbor, in said State, said line to be operated under his direction for the use of the Life-Saving Service.

SEC. 3. That the Weather Bureau shall be entitled to the use of said line under such regulations as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 4. That for carrying out the purposes of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $60,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for the establishment of life-saving stations and for the construction of a telephone line on the coast of Washington between Cape Flattery and Grays Harbor, in aid of the preservation of life and property."

ST. JOSEPH RIVER DAM IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. CLAY. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16671) permitting the building of a dam across the St. Joseph River, near the village of Berrien Springs, Berrien County, Mich., to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. May I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SURVEY OF PASSAIC RIVER, NEW JERSEY.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. KEAN on the 26th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made a survey and examination of the Passaic River, New Jersey, beginning at the Montclair and Greenwood Lake Railroad bridge to the present head of navigation at the city of Passaic, with a view to providing suitable navigation facilities for the needs of the city of Passaic.

SALE OF POULTRY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. On the 22d day of the present month I reported favorably from the Committee on the District of Columbia the bill (S. 4982) relating to the sale of poultry in the District of Columbia. Some very excellent citizens of the District request a hearing on the bill; and I move that it be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

ISSUE OF DUPLICATE GOLD CERTIFICATE.

Mr. ALLISON. From the Committee on Finance I report back without amendment the bill (H. R. 5954) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue duplicate gold certificate, in lieu of one lost, to Lincoln National Bank, of Lincoln, Ill.; and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment providing that the expert accountant, Inspector-General's Department, shall have the rank and pay of captain mounted, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ACCOUNTS OF POSTMASTERS IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to report to the Senate, from their registered returns in the office of the Sixth Auditor, the salaries of former postmasters at post-offices in the State of Illinois whose names are stated in Senate resolution No. 85, Fifty-seventh Congress, stated by commissions for the terms of service stated therein, said report to include every account in which the salary by commissions exceeds by 10 per cent or more the salary paid, such excess to be shown in each reported account, and to conform in all respects to the public order of the Postmaster-General for stating such accounts of February 17, 1884, and the Postmaster-General is hereby directed to turn over to the Sixth

Auditor in aid of the report herein ordered all data in his hands pertaining to such salary accounts of former postmasters named in said Senate resolutions.

CHOCTAWHATCHEE POWER COMPANY IN ALABAMA.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14808) authorizing the Choctawhatchee Power Company to erect a dam in Dale County, Ala.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REORGANIZATION OF THE CONSULAR SERVICE.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1511) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 1, 37, 42.

Amendment numbered 48: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out, after the words "Sault Sainte Marie," the word "Seville," in line 9, page 4; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 51: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu thereof insert the word "nine;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 73: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 73, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the two last words in said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the words "one year;" and the House agree to the same.

ACCOUNTS OF MAINE POSTMASTERS.

Mr. FRYE. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to have stated in the Sixth Auditor's Office the salary accounts of former postmasters, named on annexed memorandum schedule, who served at post-offices in Maine in terms between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, and who applied to the Postmaster-General prior to January 1, 1887, for payment of increased salary under the act of March 3, 1883, such salary accounts to be stated upon the registered returns of each postmaster for each term of service, and by the method and rule laid down by the Postmaster-General for the statement and payment of salary accounts of former postmasters under the act of March 3, 1883, in his public order of February 16, 1884; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to report to the Senate such stated salary accounts of former postmasters as soon as they can be made ready.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the difficulty that confronts me in regard to this resolution is the fact that I have been receiving a great many letters concerning the settlement of accounts of such postmasters in New Hampshire. It seems to me we ought to have a resolution covering the entire subject, dealing with the States as a whole. These accounts, I think, exist in every State. The claim is made that the Government owes these postmasters some money which they ought to have. I do not know anything about the merits of the case, but I suppose I could look up the New Hampshire matter, follow the example of the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], and have the New Hampshire cases acted upon; but if we could have a general resolution covering this matter I think it would be very much better.

Mr. FRYE. I prefer to have my own resolution passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to it, of course.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I merely want to say that I introduced a resolution on this same subject and had it referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. FRYE. And the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] had one passed a few days ago in the exact terms of this one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CULLOM. I will not object to the resolution, Mr. President, but I think, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has stated, it ought to be general and cover the whole country.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON subsequently said: I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution submitted by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] in reference to the accounts of postmasters was agreed to. I hope the Senator from Maine will allow the matter to be looked into a little. The settlement of such accounts may involve an expenditure of two or three million dollars.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be now considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, while the discussion on rate legislation has taken a wide range, the pivotal point of difference is not a serious one. I have read most critically the different bills pending before this body for rate legislation, especially the House bill, the Knox bill, the Culberson bill, and the Tillman bill. It has been charged on the floor of the Senate that the Hepburn-Dolliver bill was drawn by some shrewd railroad lawyer and in the interest of railroads. I can not join those who contend for any such position. If this bill should pass, it certainly would be a great improvement upon present conditions and in the interest of the people. So would the Culberson bill, and so would the Tillman bill, and, I say with the same freedom, so would the Knox bill. What is the history of the Hepburn-Dolliver bill? Where did it originate? What support has it received and what change will its passage make in present conditions, and what is the real difference between the Hepburn-Dolliver bill and the Knox bill? The Culberson bill is probably more drastic than any other measure pending before the Senate. The history of the Hepburn-Dolliver bill condemns the idea that this measure was drawn in the interest of railroads. The high character and standing of the men responsible for this measure overwhelm such an argument. The contents of the bill refute any such position. What I want is effective legislation that will cure existing evils and that will inflict wrong upon no one. I repeat, What is the history of the Hepburn-Dolliver bill? Both Democrats and Republicans are responsible for this measure. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the House is composed of twelve Republicans and six Democrats, consisting of Hon. WILLIAM P. HEPBURN, of Iowa; Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN, of New York; Hon. IRVING P. WANGER, of Pennsylvania; Hon. JAMES R. MANN, of Illinois; Hon. WILLIAM C. LOVERING, of Massachusetts; Hon. FREDERICK C. STEVENS, of Minnesota; Hon. CHARLES H. BURKE, of South Dakota; Hon. JOHN J. ESCH, of Wisconsin; Hon. FRANCIS W. CUSHMAN, of Washington; Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND, of Michigan; Hon. JOSEPH H. GAINES, of West Virginia; Hon. JAMES S. KENNEDY, of Ohio, Republicans; and Hon. ROBERT C. DAVEY, of Louisiana; Hon. WILLIAM C. ADAMSON, of Georgia; Hon. WILLIAM H. RYAN, of New York; Hon. WILLIAM RICHARDSON, of Alabama; Hon. CHARLES L. BARTLETT, of Georgia; Hon. GORDON RUSSELL, of Texas, Democrats.

This bill was thoroughly considered by the committee, amended in various ways, and received the unanimous support of that committee. The debate lasted for weeks, and the bill passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 346 to 7. The 7 votes recorded against this bill were against any legislation on this subject. Five of the Democratic Members of this committee are personally known to me and two of them are from Georgia. Mr. ADAMSON has had an experience of ten years in Congress, is an able lawyer, and a faithful representative of the people. Mr. BARTLETT has been a Member of Congress for ten years, was judge of the superior court of the circuit where he resided before he was elected to Congress, and is a very able member of the bar. I believe one of the ablest speeches that I have read in favor of rate legislation was delivered by Mr. RUSSELL, of Texas. Mr. RICHARDSON succeeded General Wheeler in Congress, and Mr. DAVEY has been a Member of Congress for a number of years and was the author of the Davey bill, and both of these gentlemen have labored earnestly in behalf of effective rate legislation. The membership of that entire committee refutes the idea that this measure was prepared in the interest of railroads. Mr. HEPBURN is recognized as one of the ablest Members of Congress, and his long and valuable service and devotion to the public interest overwhelm the idea of collusion in favor of railroad interest as against the interest of the American people. I have been informed that this bill was most critically examined by the minority leader in the House, and that he gave it his active support. The Hepburn-Dolliver bill is a product of the House of Representatives, representing 80,000,000 people, and was not drawn with the view of advancing the railroad interest of this country. This bill came to the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and was there considered for days and weeks, and received favorable consideration at the hands of that committee, every Democrat voting in favor of a favorable report and three Republicans joined with them in such favorable action, and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] became the stepfather of the House bill, and I beg the Senator to give decent and proper treatment to his stepchild. We have always been taught that stepfathers are not considerate of the interest and welfare of their stepchildren, but I am sure the Senator by his conduct will demonstrate in this instance that such a charge is without foundation. Now, what change will be made in the event we pass the Hepburn-Dolliver bill, and what is the real difference between this bill and the Knox bill?

The Interstate Commerce Commission time and again has recommended to Congress the passage of legislation identical with the House bill. The real meat in the bill is to be found in section 15, which is as follows:

SEC. 15. That the Commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates or charges whatsoever demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers, subject to the provisions of this act, for the transportation of persons or property, as defined in the first section of this act, or that any regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting such rates, are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged; and to make an order that the carrier shall cease and desist from such violation to the extent to which the Commission finds the same to exist, and shall not thereafter publish, demand, or collect any rate or charge for such transportation in excess of the maximum rate or charge so prescribed, and shall conform to the regulation or practice so prescribed. Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

This is the feature of the bill that gives rate-making power to the Commission, which it does not now possess. Now, let us see what provision of the Knox bill corresponds with this provision of the Hepburn-Dolliver bill which I have read. The third section of the Knox bill provides:

SEC. 3. That any person, firm, corporation, or any representative association, mercantile, agricultural, or municipal society, or any body politic or municipal organization, complaining of anything done or omitted to be done in violation of the provisions of this act, or the acts named in section 1 of this act, by any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, either by said carrier alone or in connection with some other carrier, corporation, or person using, owning, or controlling any instrumentality or facility of commerce subject to the provisions of this act, may apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission by petition, stating concisely the facts in regard to the matter complained of, and thereupon the Commission shall forward to such common carrier and others complained of a copy of the petition, with direction to answer the same in writing within a reasonable time, to be specified by the Commission.

Section 4 provides:

SEC. 4. That whenever, after full hearing upon such complaint, the said Commission shall determine that any existing rate or rates or practice whatsoever affecting the same, or any regulation or practice whatsoever as aforesaid, relating to any of the aforesaid services or transportation or incidents thereto, to be unjust, unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act or acts named in section 1 of this act, it shall be the duty of the Commission to declare and order what, in its judgment, will be a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, practice, or regulation to be charged, imposed, or followed in place of the rate or rates, charge or charges, regulation, or practice declared by it to be unjust, unreasonable, unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential under the provisions of any act referred to in section 1 hereof: Provided, That when the Commission shall order a rate reduced such reduced rate shall be the maximum to be observed by the carrier, and when the Commission shall order a practice to be changed its order shall be observed by the carrier.

The bill also provides that—

The orders of the Commission shall take effect within such reasonable time as shall be prescribed by the Commission, unless sooner set aside by order of a court in a suit to test the lawfulness of said order.

The Knox bill gives the carrier and the shipper the right to go into a court of equity and test the lawfulness of the order of the Commission; that is, the Knox bill gives the carrier and the shipper the right to go into existing courts and test the lawfulness of such order. The Hepburn-Dolliver bill provides that the Commission shall have the right to petition the courts and enforce obedience to such orders as the Commission may issue, and upon the hearing, if it appears that the order was regularly made and duly served, that the courts shall enforce obedience to such order by writ of injunction.

The Knox bill provides for a review of the action of the Commission and limits the review to the lawfulness of the rate. The Hepburn-Dolliver bill authorizes the Commission to enforce its findings by mandamus and writ of injunction and limits the jurisdiction of the court to the regularity of the order of the Commission. This is the only real difference between those two measures. Both bills provide that the rate fixed by the Commission shall go into effect and remain in force unless suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction. This is a statement of the difference between the two bills. Much has been said about the right of the carrier to have reviewed by a court the rate fixed by the Commission. Some contend that this right should be expressed in the bill and others claim that such right would be implied. Under the decisions of the court the carrier has the right to go into the courts and contest the lawfulness of the rate fixed by the Commission—that is, to have determined whether or not the rate so fixed is confiscatory or not compensatory for the services performed. It has been held by our highest court that where the legislature of a State passes a law creating a State commission and giving it the power to make reasonable and just rates and the Commission goes beyond its power and fixes a confiscatory rate, notwithstanding the law creating the Commission does not provide for any review by the courts, the constitutional right exists to go into the courts and determine whether or not the rate fixed by the State commission was confiscatory or not compensatory for the services performed.

Several cases deciding this identical question can be found, and I presume this principle will not be denied. The legislature of a State can not authorize a commission to fix any other rate than a just and reasonable one, and if the commission exceeds its powers and makes a rate that destroys the property of the carrier, then the carrier is protected by the Constitution of the United States, and can have set aside such a rate. Neither Congress nor the legislature of a State, directly or through a commission, can make a rate that does not give to the carrier what the services performed are reasonably worth. These rights can be enforced in a court of equity regardless of any provision for review by the courts. If Congress should pass a bill that simply authorizes the Commission to fix reasonable and just rates and to enforce its findings and was to stop there, then the carrier could exercise the right of going into a court of equity, setting forth that the rate fixed was confiscatory or not compensatory for the services performed, and the court would set aside such rate if the allegations were found to be true. I am in favor of expressing in the bill the powers we give to the court to review the rate fixed by the Commission. The court should not have the right to hear and determine the whole question, as did the Commission, but should simply have the right to determine whether or not the rate fixed by the Commission was a lawful one, and whether or not such rate violated the Constitution of the United States. If the Commission fixes a reasonable rate, that rate ought to stand, and the court should have no right to set it aside. The court might be of the opinion that the rate ought to be higher than the one fixed by the Commission, but unless the Commission has violated the instructions of Congress and put in operation an unconstitutional rate, then the rate ought to be left where the Commission fixes it.

Courts should be slow to interfere with the acts of Congress, and the Commission represents Congress, and a rate fixed by an intelligent body of men, devoting their lives to this kind of work, should not be set aside unless the case made by the carrier is a strong one.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would ask the Senator from Georgia whether, in his judgment, this bill does deprive the carrier of the opportunity of going into court? As I understand it, this bill in a proceeding brought by the Commission itself to enforce its orders provides that the court, in such proceeding, shall only inquire into the regularity of the order; but does that prevent the carrier from instituting a suit prior to that brought by the Commission and immediately getting an order against the Commission to enjoin the Commission from enforcing that order? Would not the carrier, in such a case, having declared that the order deprived the corporation of its property without due process of law and without just compensation, and that the enforcement of the order would work irreparable injury to the corporation, have that remedy left to it by this bill?

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, the friends of the measure—those who drafted the bill—claim that such right still exists, notwithstanding the fact that when the shipper attempts to enjoin the order of the Commission, the bill provides that the carrier shall have no right except that of testing the regularity of the order. The friends of the measure claim that this feature does not in any way impair the general power of the court to review the rate on the ground that it is a confiscatory rate, or on the ground that it does not give just compensation for the services performed.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLAY. In one moment, Mr. President, I was going on to state that if this bill intends to limit the carrier to testing the regularity of the order, and not to give the court jurisdiction to hear anything except as to the regularity of the order, then the carrier would be deprived of the right of contesting the lawfulness of a rate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask whether this bill does deprive the carrier of his remedy?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] has requested permission to interrupt the Senator from Georgia. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLAY. I will yield to either Senator or both Senators, Mr. President.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand it to be the contention of some of the friends and supporters of the House bill that the only question that can go to the court would be the question whether the Commission had fixed what, in their opinion, was a just and reasonable rate. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], in his speech the other day, in answer to the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], said the test is not whether the rate fixed by the Commission is a just and reasonable rate, but whether it is a just and reasonable rate in the opinion of the Commission. I do not know whether the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] agrees with the Senator from Iowa or not.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have expressed no such opinion.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator stated that in his speech.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will refer to the RECORD, if there is any dispute about it. I have stated it as I have read it in the RECORD.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I should be glad to yield to either or both of the Senators, but I do not want to take up too much of the time of the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course Senators will understand that it is not my purpose at all in supporting any bill to deprive any corporation of its remedy in court or to do any irreparable injury to its property, involving the deprivation of its property or a failure to give it just compensation, but I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there is nothing in this bill to prevent the carrier from bringing an action in equity to enjoin the Commission from enforcing its order.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. If there were anything in this bill to prevent the carrier from bringing such a suit, would it be valid?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; that would be absolutely void; but the act itself might be valid.

Mr. CLAY. I wish briefly to state my idea of the law, Mr. President.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me say to the Senator right here in this connection——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I simply wish to say in this connection that I would regard the act of the Commission just as I would an act of Congress. If Congress to-day should pass a statute fixing the rates for interstate commerce, classifying them, and fixing the compensation, in my judgment it would be absolutely unnecessary to provide for any review. The courts themselves would take hold of that matter, would adjust their own jurisdiction under their constitutional obligation, and would protect the corporation against any deprivation of its property. It would be no more necessary for us in such a statute to provide for a review by the courts than it would be in any statute which affects the rights of the individual.

Mr. CLAY. Now, Mr. President, I want to state briefly my idea of the law. Congress can not delegate to a commission power to make any other rate except one that gives to the carrier just compensation for the service performed; if Congress delegates to the Commission the power to fix a rate that gives just compensation for the service performed the carrier can not be deprived of the right to go into the court and test the question of the rate fixed being just and reasonable. The Constitution of the United States gives to the carrier the right to go into court and determine whether or not the rate fixed is one that gives just compensation for the service performed.

Take the legislatures of the different States. The legislature of my own State has passed a bill creating a State commission. The courts have held that where that Commission fixes a rate that is not compensatory, that is confiscatory, notwithstanding the fact that the law is silent on the question of review, the railroad has the right to go into the existing courts and have determined whether or not the rate is a confiscatory rate.

Congress can not pass a law, Mr. President, depriving the carrier of that right. Congress ought not to pass a law depriving a carrier of that right. In my opinion, if the bill gives the power to the Commission to fix a rate and is silent so far as review by a court is concerned, and provides that the standard fixed by Congress shall be a just and reasonable one, then the carrier would have the right to go into existing courts and have determined the question whether the rate fixed is a constitutional and compensatory rate.

A good deal has been said about review, and there are only two pivotal points of difference between us——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Before the Senator leaves the point which he has been just discussing, I understand him to maintain—and I am not asking this in any spirit of criticism at all, because the rest of us are not in accord—that if the bill simply authorized the fixing of a rate and left it there, the carrier would have a right to go into court to resist the unlawful taking of his property?

Mr. CLAY. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. CLAPP. No. I understand the Senator feels that the language in section 16, which provides for the bringing of an action by the Commission, is restrictive of that right?

Mr. CLAY. Well, I am not certain of that. I think it is very doubtful.

Mr. CLAPP. I want to call the Senator's attention to the purpose in the minds of those who have perhaps been somewhat active in framing this bill. In that section, if the Senator will read it, is the following language:

> If any carrier fails or neglects to obey any order of the Commission, other than for the payment of money, while the same is in effect.

In other words, if the carrier does not, under the broad power of the court and the constitutional right of the citizen, apply to a court to have this order vacated or suspended, but allows the order to go into effect, it is only in that case that the action provided for on page 16 is applicable; and then, presumably, the carrier having not cared to test his rights under the equity power of the court, the remedy is limited to the question of the regularity of the order. It is a sort of supplemental proceeding designed to give the Commission authority, after the carrier has allowed the order to go into effect by declining to oppose the effect of the order, to bring the suit. I want to call the Senator's attention to what was the purpose at least of that provision.

Mr. CLAY. I catch the point of the Senator. I understand the Senator to claim that this provision of the bill applies after the order has already gone into effect.

Mr. CLAPP. Entirely.

Mr. CLAY. And it is to enable the Commission to enforce the order. Now, I want to understand——

Mr. CLAPP. Not to enforce the order, but to enforce—it may seem like a technical distinction—to enforce obedience to the order, the time having passed away within which the carrier might have resisted the order.

Mr. CLAY. I accept that statement. Then the Senator claims that so far as the right of reviewing the rate on constitutional grounds is left silent, and the general law——

Mr. CLAPP. Not silent by any means.

Mr. CLAY. Where is there a provision especially providing for a review? I have not found it.

Mr. CLAPP. It is not, perhaps, especially provided for, but it is contemplated. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. CLAY. The bill provides that the rate fixed by the Commission shall remain in force until suspended or set aside by the Commission or until suspended or set aside by a court.

Mr. CLAPP. Of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. CLAY. Of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. CLAPP. It then provides for venue, and then provides for expediting the cause.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLAY. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. To show that I was not incorrect in my statement as to what some of the friends of this bill claim, I desire to read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 4172, a statement made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]:

> If the Senator from Texas will observe—
> I ask the attention of the Senate to this language——

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. This is directly upon the point which the Senator is now discussing as to whether, under this bill, any question can go to the courts, except as to whether the order was regularly made by the Commission. It is directly upon the point. The Senator from Iowa said:

> If the Senator from Texas will observe, the test of the rate fixed by the Commission in the House bill is not the question whether the rate will be just and reasonable and fairly remunerative, but what, in the judgment of the Commission, would be a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate.
> In other words, the sole question that could be considered by the court under that construction of the law would be whether this order was regularly made.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That was a discussion of fragmentary character with the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. I have stated on this floor not less than ten times that my opinion was that under this bill the court could review this order from the standpoint of whether it deprived the carrier of its property under the Constitution of the United States, and in reviewing that question I certainly have not intended to leave the impression that the only question involved was the regularity of the order.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am quite willing to leave that question with the language which I have just read. This whole discussion seems to be fragmentary in the sense that sometimes one contention is made by one friend of the bill and sometimes another contention is made by another friend of the bill.

Mr. CLAY. Now, let us settle that question. Why can not we settle it and legislate, and get through with this measure?

In the first place, everyone agrees—I do not believe there is a lawyer in this body who does not agree to the proposition—that the carrier has the right to go into court, regardless of whether the bill says so, and have reviewed the rate, to see whether or not it gives just compensation for the service performed. If we all agree that the carrier possesses that constitutional right, why not say so directly in the bill and get through with it? I can not see any objection to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CLAY. I want to get through with one point more before I yield.

I believe, though, that the question of review ought to be confined to the question as to whether or not the rate fixed by the Commission is a constitutional rate and gives just compensation for the service performed. I do not believe that the court ought to have the right to go into the whole case.

The court may have a different idea about a reasonable rate from that of the Commission, but unless the Commission has violated the express will of Congress, unless the Commission has fixed a rate that takes the property of the carrier without just compensation, then the rate ought to stand. But if the Interstate Commerce Commission has fixed a rate that is confiscatory, that violates the Constitution of the United States, the courts have a right to review that question; and why not give it and say so and not hesitate about it?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish the Senator to make it clear as to whether, in his judgment, the right of review embraces the right of the court to determine whether the order gave just compensation, or whether he means the right of review, which he contends we can not take away and do not want to take away, is on the constitutional side of it. In other words, in the difference between a just and reasonable rate and a confiscatory rate there is considerable latitude of determination, because it might get pretty close to confiscation and it might get pretty close to just and reasonable and not be exactly either. The question we want to determine here is the right of the courts to go over the case on the question of reasonableness and justness. If the Senator contends that we can not confiscate, I agree with him; and the court would recognize that it had the power, and would enforce the power, to review the case if we took the property without just compensation.

But there are two phases of this subject here, and I wish the Senator would elaborate those two points and tell us the line of demarcation between them and tell us where he stands on the two.

Mr. CLAY. I thought I made myself understood. I will go over it again in a minute.

When the Interstate Commerce Commission fixes a rate—they are a body of able men, lawyers and business men—they hear all the facts, all the circumstances; they go over the situation. Then the Commission fixes what, in its judgment, is a just and reasonable rate. If there is an attempt to review that rate in the court—and I am clear that the right exists—the court ought to be confined to the question whether or not the Commission has violated the legislative will of Congress and fixed a rate that is confiscatory or that does not give just compensation for the services performed by the carrier.

Do you know that when the Commission acts it is Congress? We delegate to the Commission the right to act. We fix a standard for the Commission—that the rate must be reasonable and just—and we say to the Commission, "You must not go beyond that standard," and when the Commission has acted, it is the act of Congress; and the courts ought to be slow to set aside a rate fixed by the Commission unless there has been a flagrant violation of the law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Not only slow, but ought they not to be forbidden to do so?

Mr. CLAY. They ought to be forbidden to set aside a rate unless that rate is not a just and compensatory rate. There may be different degrees of reasonableness, as there are different degrees of justice. I have seen men who had higher ideas of justice than others.

Mr. TILLMAN. That was a difference in the men, not in the justice.

Mr. CLAY. I do not know about that, but I will say to the Senator that I have seen some judges who had a higher ideal of justice than others. But I was going to say this: I do not insist that the review shall do anything more than give the carrier the rights it would have under the Constitution, whether we give them or not.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why give it, then? If the carrier would have the right anyhow, why say anything about it?

Mr. CLAY. I prefer a bill that gives the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to hear complaints, the power to fix a reasonable and just rate, and to enforce its findings, and stop there, and under the decisions of our Supreme Court the carrier then could go into court and test the question whether the rate fixed took its property without due process of law.

But, Mr. President, I have been asked a question, and I can not answer it. If I have any rule in my life it is frankness. I have been asked, "If you concede that under the Constitution the carrier has the right to go into court and contest a rate that is confiscatory, a rate that does not give just compensation for the services performed, if you concede that that right exists, then why are you unwilling to insert it in the bill?" And I can not answer the argument.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CLAY. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information. It is not for the purpose of combatting his position.

I agree with him that the simple fact that there is no provision in a statute for a review will not invalidate the statute. But I understand the Senator to say that he is opposed to any review except such as will permit the carrier to test the constitutionality of an order or to protect itself against the invasion of its constitutional rights. I understood him to say that the carriers have that right under the bill or under any bill which does not specifically deny it to them. The Senator says now if they have that right, why not give it to them in explicit terms? I ask the Senator, If they have that right what is the necessity of giving it to them?

Mr. CLAY. I will answer the question.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator will allow me to go a little further.

Mr. CLAY. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. Particularly in view of the fact that when you begin to frame provisions for regulating the extent to which the review may go, it is a difficult and somewhat complex proceeding, I submit. But if the bill, standing as it does, not denying the party the right to go into court to contest his purely constitutional rights, is valid, why enter upon the complex and difficult proceeding of framing a provision that will limit him to just exactly what you say the bill as it stands gives him?

Mr. CLAY. The argument of the Senator from Oregon would be unanswerable if there was nothing in this bill in regard to review. If this bill was silent about the courts, and I clearly understood what it meant—and probably the Senator from Minnesota is correct—if it was absolutely silent and simply gave the Commission the power to hear complaints and fix rates and enforce its findings, and stopped there, I would have made no complaint. The carrier then could go into a court of equity, into existing courts, and file a bill and secure all of its constitutional rights.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CLAY. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia why it would not be better to amend the bill by striking out all reference to the courts rather than to attempt to shape in this bill the jurisdiction of the courts? Let me call his attention to the fact that the fixing of rates involves purely a matter of legislative discretion, and the discretion exercised is a legislative discretion. Will there not be danger, if we attempt to shape the provision for review by the courts, that there will be an effort made to turn over to the judiciary a part of that legislative discretion?

Would it not be better to leave to the judiciary itself the shaping of the remedy that is to apply to a case involving the deprivation of property or failure to give just compensation? Is not the judiciary more likely to confine itself to its purely judicial power under those circumstances than if we shape provisions for review which may expressly or by implication turn over to the judiciary part of the legislative discretion? I do not object to review. I object to the expressions in the proposed amendments regarding review, and I object to them because I fear that the result of the proposed act will be to turn over to the judiciary review of the legislative discretion of the Commission, and not simply to confine itself to its judicial power of condemning a rate that fails to give just compensation.

Mr. CLAY. I think if nothing was said in this bill about a court of review, it would have the same effect as the kind of review I have been discussing. If we said nothing about a review, in my opinion the carrier would have the right to go into court and have determined the question whether the rate was a just and compensatory one for the services performed. In my opinion if you have a review, it ought to be confined to that question, and without any serious trouble it can be confined to that question. If I am not mistaken, the Knox bill provides that the court shall have the right to test simply the lawfulness of the rate. That is my recollection. I am not certain about it. That is immaterial. So far as I am concerned I have no objection to expressing in this bill the right of review and describing what power we give the courts. I have no objection to it because it exists under the Constitution. But if we provide for a review, I would expressly say that the courts should not review anything except the question whether or not the Commission exceeded its power and fixed a rate that was contrary to the Constitution and contrary to the law.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLAY. I want to get through.

Mr. ALDRICH. I merely wish to ask a simple question. I suppose the Senator would be in favor of extending the same rights to the shippers as against an extortionate or unreasonable rate?

Mr. CLAY. I was just coming to that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CLAY. I would not only give the carrier the right to go into court to have determined whether or not its constitutional rights had been violated, whether or not a rate had been fixed that was confiscatory (and our courts have held that the word "confiscatory" and the words "just compensation" practically mean the same thing), but I would give the shipper the right to go into court and make a contest and see whether or not the rate fixed by the Commission was too high and violated the rights of the citizen.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. What possible remedy could there be in such a case? The only jurisdiction of the court is to vacate the order, and it is hard to imagine a shipper going into court because the rate had not been reduced to suit him.

Mr. CLAY. The court could enjoin the enforcement of a rate that was too high.

Mr. DOLLIVER. But the only jurisdiction of the court would be to vacate the order.

Mr. CLAY. The shipper could go into court where the rate was extortionate, unreasonably high, as he can do now under the common law, and he could ask the court to enjoin the enforcement of the rate, and the railroads could be denied the right to enforce that rate in the future.

Now, again, I want to say this: The Interstate Commerce Commission may not always be in favor of the American people. I have seen the time in the history of some States where the railroad commission was not always in favor of the rights of the people. When the power is given to the Interstate Commerce Commission to make rates—and the power to make rates ought to be given to it—the Commission may some time be under the influence of the railroads. Such conditions exist to-day in some of the States. If such conditions should ever arise in the United States as to the Interstate Commerce Commission, I do not wish to leave the people helpless.

Mr. ELKINS. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia one question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator says he is willing that localities and communities shall have the right to go into court to secure a review of the orders of the Commission. The junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] denies positively that any power is conferred by this bill upon the Commission to make rates between localities. I ask the Senator from Georgia if he agrees to that.

Mr. DOLLIVER. My honored friend, the Senator from West Virginia, ought not to say that about me.

Mr. ELKINS. I understood the Senator to say it. I beg his pardon if it is not the case. Did he not say yesterday on this floor that the Commission under this bill has no power to determine relative rates between localities and communities?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I expressly said it had the power as between localities on the same line.

Mr. ELKINS. On different lines.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I did. I said it had no power to determine port differentials, because——

Mr. ELKINS. I ask the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Georgia this question: Do you believe that the Hepburn bill confers upon the Commission power to determine relative rates between communities and localities situated on different lines?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not.

Mr. ELKINS. You say it does not confer this power?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I expressly tried to so state yesterday.

Mr. ELKINS. I then ask the Senator from Georgia why he is willing to give the courts power to review the orders of the Commission as to rates between localities and communities?

Mr. DOLLIVER. There are communities on a given line of railroad.

Mr. ELKINS. Oh, Mr. President, everybody knows that, and there are communities not on a given line, and I call the attention of the Senator to the Maximum Rate case, to the Wichita and Omaha case, where the Commission undertook to fix rates between communities on different lines.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The Wichita case was on the same line.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator has said over and over again that this bill does not confer on the Commission the power to determine relative rates between communities on different lines, has he not?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have.

Mr. ELKINS. And you say so now?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do.

Mr. ELKINS. Why does the Senator from Georgia want that power conferred?

Mr. CLAY. I did not say I wanted to have it conferred.

Mr. SPOONER. May not the Commission, on the complaint of the chamber of commerce or the board of trade of one city on a line, fix a rate which might be ruinous to another city on the same line——

Mr. ELKINS. I agree with that.

Mr. SPOONER. Utterly discriminatory.

Mr. ELKINS. I agree with that entirely.

Mr. SPOONER. If you are legislating upon the theory that the Commission is fallible as to railroad companies, why do you legislate upon the theory that it may not be fallible as to cities on the same line?

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator misunderstood me. I agree with the Senator. I believe the bill confers upon the Commission the power to do the thing which is denied by the Senator from Iowa, one of the framers of the bill, but I do not believe it can constitutionally do this without the right of review by the courts. The power is clearly conferred by the Hepburn bill on the Commission to determine relative rates between communities, and if it is conferred, I believe in these communities having the right just as much as the individual to go into court and have the orders of the Commission reviewed.

But here is one of the troubles we find: The Senator from Iowa, who I believe is the chief spokesman in behalf of the bill, denies this, and he has denied it over and over again. The trouble is we can not get any agreement between the framers of the bill as to just what it does mean. There was no agreement in the House and there is none here.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me a minute?

Mr. CLAY. Yes. I am occupying entirely too much of the time of the Senate, though.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator from West Virginia that the trouble is not among the friends of the bill, but the trouble seems to be among those opposed to it. One class are opposed to it on high, constitutional grounds; others on the ground that it does not afford the right of review; and others, again, are opposed to the right of regulation at all.

Now, coming to the point suggested by the Senator from Iowa a minute ago, the Commission is only incidentally authorized to pass upon relative rates between towns. The only question they are authorized to decide is whether a given rate complained of is a just and reasonable rate. Now, such a decision may possibly affect the relative rates between towns——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. But the express power of fixing relative rates between towns is not conferred, and the Commission upon that, as an independent proposition, have no right to act.

Mr. ALDRICH. What about the third section?

Mr. NELSON. To illustrate: If complaint is made that the rates as between Chicago and Milwaukee to the seaboard are relatively not correct, are relatively not right, the Commission would not have the right to pass on the question. But if the complaint is made that the rate from either of those points to the seaboard is not a just and reasonable rate, the Commission have the power to pass on it, and it might incidentally affect the relative rates between Chicago and Milwaukee.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CLAY. I will, but after that I must proceed.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator will allow me to answer the Senator from Minnesota. I will not trouble him again.

The Senator from Minnesota does me injustice when he says or intimates, if he did, that I am not a friend of this bill. I am the best friend it has here, because I want to amend it and make it a stronger bill and a better bill that can be understood, a bill about which there will be no differences after we vote on it. The trouble is, the bill does not go far enough. It does not attempt to afford a remedy for the abuses that oppress the people most. The Senator states that relative rates might be affected by the decision of the Commission, but I go further than he does. I say the Commission, under the language by "any rule, practice, or regulation affecting rates," confers the broadest possible power, and the Senator from Iowa can not possibly find it with a microscope in the bill which he helped to frame, and I claim he did not make the bill strong enough. If I raise these questions, I do not want it to be understood that I am not a friend of the bill. I favor the bill. I will vote for it, and have always intended to do so, but prefer to amend it and make it a better bill. I am just as good a friend of it as the Senator from Minnesota, and, I think, a better friend than the Senator from Iowa, because he does not know how to construe the bill, nor does the Senator from South Carolina, when they say it does not confer the power on the Commission. I claim it does. I think the clear weight of authority is against both of them upon the construction of this bill. I insist again and again that the language is so broad that there can be no doubt about its conferring the power on the Commission to fix the rate between communities and locations on different lines of railroad.

The question is whether or not we should confer this power. Can we do it constitutionally or not, and if we can do it constitutionally, is it, as a practical question, right to do it?

I thank the Senator from Georgia. I will not interrupt him again.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I do not know where I was. I was going to say that, in my opinion, the Senator from Iowa has done faithful work in the preparation of this bill, and I agree fully with him in regard to the construction that he has placed on that feature of the bill we are discussing. I shall vote for his bill as it stands if I can not improve it and make it stronger. Every amendment I suggest will make it more effective and in the interest of the American people.

I must decline to be interrupted. I wish to complete my remarks, and these interruptions break my line of thought.

One other question I wish to discuss. The Knox bill and the Hepburn-Dolliver bill, except on one point, are the same thing. In fact, they are the same thing in every respect except on the question of review. The Senator from Pennsylvania provides in his bill that the rate fixed by the Interstate Commerce Com-sion shall go into effect and remain in force until suspended or set aside by the Commission or suspended or set aside by the court in a suit to test the lawfulness of the rate. That is the Knox bill as I understand it.

The Hepburn-Dolliver bill provides that the rate fixed by the Commission shall go into effect and remain in force until suspended or set aside by the Commission, or until suspended or set aside by a court, and stops there. Both of them provide that the court shall have a right to suspend the rate. Both provide that the rate shall stay in effect until set aside or suspended by a court. There is no difference between the bills on this point.

Now, Mr. President, I am willing, as far as I am concerned, to get rid of one trouble, and I believe the Senator from Iowa will concede that it is not a serious trouble. I am willing to provide that the constitutional right to review the rate shall be put in the bill. I hardly think the Senator from Iowa would object to it, as he insists that that right exists now. If it exists now, then no harm can be done by putting it in the bill.

But, again, the question that has given me more trouble in regard to this measure than any other is the constitutional question. It is almost impossible to find three great lawyers who have the same constitutional views about any question. I heard the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] make a most ingenious argument, and his speeches are always able. He contended, with earnestness and ability, that Congress could not fix a standard and delegate to the Commission the power to fix rates, and that the Supreme Court would declare such a law unconstitutional. Yesterday I heard one of the great lawyers of the Senate, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], deliver a magnificent legal argument, and he said that in his opinion Congress could fix a standard and clearly delegate to the Commission the power to find what is a reasonable and a just rate.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator understands how both of us can be and are right.

Mr. CLAY. I can understand how both are honest, but I can not understand how you are both right.

Mr. FORAKER. Then I will tell the Senator, if he will allow me.

The proposition I advanced and contended for was that it is competent for Congress to confer on a commission power to make rates, provided it creates a standard that is intelligible and in accordance with which rates can be made, as they were, for instance, under the Iowa statute, by mere calculation or by the exercise of some administrative duty.

What the Senator from Pennsylvania said yesterday, as I understood him, was that it is competent for the Congress to establish a standard, and then commit to the Commission the duty of making rates in accordance with the standard. But he did not go on to say what the standard should be. I imagine he would say, if interrogated, that it would have to be an intelligible standard that there could be some conformity to.

Mr. CLAY. I may have misunderstood the Senator from Ohio. I understood the Senator to say in his previous argument that he did not believe Congress possessed the power to make rates, and if Congress is without power to make rates, then how could Congress delegate this power to the Commission?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, that is entirely true. I did say that, but I said, as a second proposition, if I should be in error about it, and it should be held that the Congress has power to fix rates, then the next question is whether it could confer that power on the Commission. I contended that it could, but that the duty assigned to the Commission would have to be administrative instead of legislative.

Mr. CLAY. But I was illustrating how great lawyers will differ about constitutional questions, and in fact great judges differ. If I remember correctly, on the constitutional question involved in the Porto Rican tariff five judges thought one way and four another. That does not reflect on the integrity of the court, however. If I remember correctly, in the income-tax cases five judges thought one way and four another. On great constitutional questions lawyers will differ, and the only way we can have those questions determined is to present them in such a way that the court may pass upon them, and when the court does pass upon them then that is an end.

As I said, there is one other question that I have not been able to settle satisfactorily. I have not been able to find any decision of the Supreme Court that settles to my satisfaction the point to which I have just alluded. We all agree that the Commission should be given the rate-making power, or at least a large majority of the Senate agree to this proposition, that the Commission shall also be given the power to prevent undue discriminations as between persons and places and unjust preferentials. The rate fixed by the Commission, indirectly speaking, is the rate fixed by Congress. When the Commission corrects any undue discrimination or unjust preferential, its action, indirectly speaking, is also the act of Congress. Congress not having the time to devote to these details has delegated to the Commission the power to act in the premises. When the Commission has acted, the presumption is that the rate fixed by the Commission is both reasonable and just, and this rate ought to go into effect until set aside or reversed. The controlling question that seems to be dividing Senators is, "Ought or can Congress deprive the courts of the right of temporarily enjoining the rates fixed by the Commission until a final hearing?" To my mind, as a question of policy or justice, this is easily answered. If Congress has provided a Commission of able and impartial men to hear disputed facts and ascertain what are reasonable and just rates, then ought these rates so ascertained and fixed be set aside and a rate substituted therefor by the railroads until the case is fully heard and disposed of?

Ought any court to be permitted without notice and without hearing to set aside the solemn act of Congress through its Commission? As a matter of justice and right, I would say "No." The presumption is that the Commission has acted honestly, intelligently, and that its findings are just both to the roads and the shippers, and the railroads and the people ought to abide by these rates until there is a full and complete hearing, and a reversal of the findings of the Commission. When a suitor goes into court contesting the acts of Congress such suitor ought to be bound by such acts of Congress until the same are set aside.

If there were no constitutional objections in the way, I would say, by all means, that the rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission ought not to be disturbed in any way until a final hearing, and until set aside by a court on final hearing. But the question presents itself to my mind, Can Congress limit the power of the courts so as to deprive the carrier of the right to go into equity and restrain a rate alleged to be unconstitutional?

Can we deprive the courts of the power to grant temporary injunctions setting aside the rate fixed by the Commission? Where the Constitution provides that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law, and the carrier alleges that a rate has been fixed whereby such carrier is being deprived of his property without due process of law, for the reason that the rate is a confiscatory rate, then can Congress deny to the carrier the right to go into a court to prevent the Commission from enforcing such a rate? In other words, where a citizen is given a constitutional right and courts have been created for the purpose of enforcing that constitutional right, can Congress deprive the citizen for any length of time of a court where such constitutional right can be enforced? If no constitutional right was involved, the question could be easily answered. We clearly give the court the power to finally determine as to whether or not the rate fixed is a constitutional rate, and to set aside the rate in the event it is found to be unconstitutional.

Having given the court jurisdiction of the subject-matter, can we deprive the court of the power of exercising the right of granting temporary injunctions or interlocutory orders, restraining rates until the question can be fully determined? I am fearful that such a provision would be declared to be unconstitutional, and I would not be willing to vote for any such provision unless it could be drafted in such a way so that the constitutionality of such provision could be passed upon without in any way affecting the remainder of the bill. I believe the weight of the decisions of the courts, presented during this debate, would indicate that we can not deprive the court of any such power.

I am clear in my mind that Congress can regulate the practice in granting or refusing injunctions. A court with ordinary intelligence and a proper appreciation of the rights of parties would not grant a temporary order restraining a rate fixed by the Commission without notice and a hearing. The exercising of the power of granting temporary or interlocutory orders, interfering with the laws of Congress and the rights of litigants without notice and a proper and full hearing, is a power that ought not to be exercised except in extreme cases. I am sure, after a most thorough investigation, that Congress can provide that no temporary injunction or interlocutory order shall be granted by the courts, restraining or enjoining rates fixed by the Commission, without proper notice and a full hearing. As to whether or not Congress can deprive the courts of the right of enjoining a rate, until the case is finally disposed of, is a question of grave doubt. If we provide in the bill that the rate fixed by the Commission shall not be suspended by any temporary interlocutory order or injunction, but shall be enforced until reversed or set aside on final hearing, then such provision should be so framed that the constitutionality of such a provision can be passed upon without in any way involving the remainder of the bill.

Whether or not Congress can prohibit the courts from granting such a temporary injunction, to my mind, is not a settled question. The ablest lawyers in this Senate, after a most thorough investigation, have taken different views as to the constitutionality of such a right. Such a provision can be inserted and its constitutionality determined without in any way affecting the remainder of the bill. By no means should such a provision be interwoven with the remainder of the bill so as to affect other features of this legislation in the event such provision should be declared to be unconstitutional. The people expect us to give them a bill that will stand the test of the courts and we can not afford to take any chances whereby this entire legislation may be declared unconstitutional. I believe the amendment introduced by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] would, to a large extent, remedy the evil of which we complain. I ask to insert this amendment as a part of my remarks.

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. SIMMONS to the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, viz:

On page 11, after the word "effect," strike out "thirty" and insert "forty."

Add after the words "this act," in line 14, page 12, a new section, as follows:

"SEC. —. That any shipper or carrier being a party to a proceeding under section 4 of this act may, within fifteen days after notice of an order by the Commission prescribing a rate or rates, and not afterwards, apply by an appropriate proceeding in equity to any circuit court of the United States of competent jurisdiction under existing law for an order to restrain the enforcement of such rate or rates upon complaint and affidavit, which shall be accompanied with a certified copy of the proceedings, together with the evidence had before the Commission, setting forth the day when said rate or rates will go into effect, and alleging that unless the enforcement of said rate or rates is restrained his or its property will be taken without just compensation. Upon the filing of this application the court shall issue a notice or summons to the Commission, returnable before said court at chambers, to appear within ten days and answer said application. If said shipper or carrier shall desire to apply for a preliminary or interlocutory order to suspend said rate or rates until final decree, he or it shall upon the return day of said summons or notice file a written notice to that effect, and either said shipper, carrier, or the Commission may within ten days thereafter submit to the court, upon affidavit or otherwise, as the court may direct, such additional evidence as they may desire to offer, and thereupon the court, upon consideration of said additional evidence, together with the order, proceedings, and evidence made and taken by and before the Commission, which shall be taken as prima facie establishing the fact that said rate or rates are just and reasonable, proceed to pass upon and decide said application, granting or refusing the same."

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. PATTERSON. A question has been suggested to my mind by one of the statements made by the Senator from Georgia, and I should like his attention.

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PATTERSON. When a shipper complains to the Interstate Commerce Commission it is upon the ground that the rates of the railroads are unjust; that they may be extortionate. The Interstate Commerce Commission makes its finding. It finds that the rates of the railway companies were unjust or were extortionate, and fixes what it claims are just compensatory rates. They go into court and they ask the court to temporarily enjoin the enforcement of that rate fixed by the Commission. The court for good causes issues the injunction. Now, what is the result? The shipper, and all the shippers of the country who are using that road and are required to pay those rates, observing the schedule, are sent back to a rate or schedule that has been declared by the Commission to be unjust, and it may be highly extortionate. So when you get an injunction against the Commission and suspend the operation of the rates fixed by the Commission the shipper is sent back to a rate that has been declared to be extortionate, unjust, and unfair. That is the necessary result. Now, there is no relief in that proceeding for the shipper.

Mr. CLAY. There is no difference between the Senator from Colorado and myself upon that point.

Mr. PATTERSON. Then why should not the rate fixed by the Commission be sustained by the court until there is a final adjudication of it?

Mr. CLAY. I have said, and I do not want to be misunderstood, because this is a most important point——

Mr. PATTERSON. It is one which has given me more trouble than anything else.

Mr. CLAY. I have said to the Senate that I am in favor of abridging the right of injunction in every way I can that is constitutional. If I were clear in my mind that we could shut off injunction and prevent the rate from being interfered with until there is a final hearing, I would be willing to do it. In fact, I am anxious to do so, because justice demands that the rate fixed by the Commission shall stand till set aside after a full hearing.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, asking the Senator from Georgia another question, is it not the fact that if an interlocutory injunction is prohibited by this bill the only thing the Supreme Court can do when that question is brought before it is to declare that that provision of the bill is unconstitutional? Under those circumstances, why might we not put the provision in the bill for the sole purpose of asking the decision of the Supreme Court upon it?

Mr. CLAY. I have said to the Senate, in language which can not be mistaken, that I favor such provision, if inserted in such a way that its constitutionality can be passed upon without interfering with the rate-making power given in the bill. I have said that I have grave doubts as to whether or not it will be sustained; but I will support it if we leave it where it can be passed upon by the courts without destroying the rate-making power. There is no difference between the Senator and myself in regard to that matter; but I tell you now that after reading authority after authority upon this subject I find the weight of authority clearly against depriving the court of that right.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I interrupt the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose there is a doubt about it.

Mr. CLAY. I would give the doubt in favor of the people.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is it not the duty of the Supreme Court in construing an act of Congress to solve all doubt in favor of the act of Congress? Has that not been the rule since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary?

Mr. CLAY. That is true, but I do not care to discuss that question any further. There are many different views here in regard to it. Eminent lawyers differ.

Mr. PATTERSON. Just a single question. The Senator will admit, then, that the only way to get a decision of the Supreme Court upon that very important question is by incorporating a provision of that kind in the bill.

Mr. CLAY. That is true. That is true beyond any question.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator having mentioned about the income tax and the opinion of two able lawyers, I want to remind him that the Supreme Court has been on both sides of that question itself. So it is no wonder that these lawyers who are depending on the opinions of that court are befuddled.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator and myself are warm personal friends, and I esteem him most highly. I do not know a man in the Senate I esteem more highly. But when the Senator and myself get to discussing some courts we may have the same opinion. I expect we do. However, on the general proposition, I am frank to say, I have faith in the integrity of most of the courts.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have faith in their integrity, but not in their infallibility.

Mr. CLAY. None of us are infallible. We are all liable to error.

Now, Mr. President, I believe I have discussed the two points about which there is a difference.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Georgia had taken occasion to discuss an amendment which I offered on Tuesday, I think, to the pending bill, and at the same time he was discussing the question of the constitutionality of any provision which might in any way interfere with the right or power of the courts to restrain the action of the Commission pending a review. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia if he means to be understood as saying that the amendment which I introduced would be obnoxious to any constitutional objection whatsoever?

Mr. CLAY. Clearly not. It is a different question as to whether you can deprive a court of the power of exercising the right of issuing an injunction. Your amendment is simply regulating the practice; that is all, and nothing more.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I wish to ask the Senator if his attention has been drawn to the case of Brown v. Kalamazoo Circuit Judge, reported in 75 Michigan? It is a case to which I had intended to refer yesterday, and, indeed it is referred to in my printed remarks. I think it is a most illuminating decision upon this question, as to the power of Congress to disturb or interfere in any manner with the power of a court of equity. If I may take a moment of the Senator's time, I should like to bring it to his attention.

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the Senator, but I am anxious to get through.

Mr. KNOX. In that case it appears that the legislature of Michigan passed a statute which provided that the questions of fact in equity cases should be tried by a jury instead of being passed upon by the chancellor, as has been the chancery practice from time immemorial. A man named Brown began a proceeding in equity and the chancellor referred the questions of fact in his case to a jury. Brown made an application to the Supreme Court of Michigan for a mandamus to compel the chancellor to go on and try the questions of fact himself, squarely raising the question as to the constitutionality of the law which took away from the court of chancery the right to pass upon a question of fact and delegated that to a jury.

After calling attention to the fact that by virtue of her long Territorial existence Michigan had fashioned her system of jurisprudence after that of the United States, the court said:

This leads to the inquiry whether it is competent for legislation to bring about any such radical change as is here attempted. We think it is not. The decisions of the United States Supreme Court, before referred to, do not bind State practice, but they nevertheless to some extent indicate the real difficulty. That tribunal did not decide that under the United States Constitution there could be no change in equitable procedure, because the whole body of chancery practice has been repeatedly amended and simplified by that court. Their rulings mean neither more nor less than that there are various kinds of interests and controversies which can not be left without equitable disposal without either destroying them or impairing their value.

And here comes the nub of the whole decision—

It is within the power of a legislature to change the formalities of legal procedure, but it is not competent to make such changes as to impair the enforcement of rights. In rude times, when there is no business and no variety of property rights, very simple remedies are sufficient. But where the ordinary remedies have become inadequate to deal with more extended or peculiar interests, such as multiply in all civilized countries, different methods and different tribunals become necessary. The universally recognized basis of equitable jurisprudence, found in statutes and constitutions as well as in the reports and text writers, is the inadequacy of the common law to deal with these subjects. A principal basis of that inadequacy was the nature of the tribunal passing on the facts. In common-law issues fact and law can be readily separated, but in the great majority of equity proceedings it is impossible to make any such separation.

Now, the court sums up the general proposition in these words:

The functions of judges in equity cases in dealing with them is as well settled a part of the judicial power and as necessary to its administration as the functions of juries in common-law cases. Our constitutions are framed to protect all rights. When they vest judicial power, they do so in accordance with all of its essentials, and when they vest it in any court they vest it as efficient for the protection of rights, and not subject to be distorted or made inadequate. The right to have equity controversies dealt with by equitable methods is as sacred as the right of trial by jury.

I regard that as a most significant opinion.

Mr. CLAY. My attention had been called to that decision by the senior Senator from Texas.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CLAY. I will yield, but I wish to finish.

Mr. McLAURIN. Well, it will take more than a minute to reply to what has just been stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], if the Senator from Georgia will permit me to do so.

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, so far as I have had an opportunity to read the case which has just been read by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], I think the real nub of the case, as it is called by the Senator, was decided long before the court reached the academic question that was presented to the court in that case, as the court stated, to obtain a ruling on a statute of Michigan enacted in 1887. The real point upon which the court decided that case was that the act was impracticable; that it was impossible for a jury to try all the issues that were presented to the court in a case in chancery as they could try simply one issue ordinarily presented to a court, if not universally presented to a court—a common-law court—and for that reason the court held that the statute, being impracticable, was void.

The court then went on to state its opinion, which, in my judgment, was obiter dictum. It is an opinion that is academic. I want to read, in answer to that opinion, what was said in a case that was not obiter dictum, that came before a court in Texas. In the case of the Austin and Northwestern Railway Company v. Cluck, Judge Stayton, speaking for the Texas supreme court, said:

If it is claimed that in the court, as a court of equity, under that clause [of the Constitution], the power existed, it must be replied that the district court, whether as a court of law or a court of equity, had only such power as the Constitution gave it. There is no such thing as the inherent power of a court, if by that be meant a power which a court may exercise without a law authorizing it. That clause of the Constitution empowered district courts to exercise all the power given, whether the procedure necessary to accomplish that purpose be such as pertains to a court of law or a court of equity; but it in no manner conferred upon such courts the power to exercise any and every power which at any time may have been exercised by courts of chancery in England or elsewhere.

The constitution of the State of Texas, so far as this question was concerned, was practically what the Constitution of the United States is, and the court held that "there is no such thing as the inherent power of a court."

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CLAY. I had yielded to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN], and I will yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I rise simply to say that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] is mistaken in saying that the constitution of Texas is the same in this respect as the Constitution of the United States. In Texas we have the code system, and the distinction between law and equity does not prevail there.

Mr. McLAURIN. May I read the constitution that is referred to in this case?

Mr. CLAY. Yes.

Mr. McLAURIN. Article 5, section 8 of the constitution of Texas defines the jurisdiction and powers of the district courts in the following language:

The district court shall have original jurisdiction * * * of all suits, complaints, or pleas whatever, without regard to any distinction between law and equity, when the matter in controversy shall be valued at or amount to $500 exclusive of interest.

Then the court proceed to say:

And the legislature has defined the jurisdiction of the district courts in the same language. The common law was adopted by the Congress of the Republic by enactment embraced in the following article, 3258, of the Revised Statutes of 1895: "The common law of England (so far as is not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the State) shall, together with such constitution and laws, be the rule of decision and shall continue in force until altered or repealed by the legislature." Whatever may be the powers of courts of other States, there can be no doubt that the courts of Texas must look to the constitution of this State, the enactments of the legislature, and the common law for their authority to proceed as requested in this case; and if the authority did not exist at common law, and has not been conferred by the constitution nor by the statutes of the State, then no court in Texas has the power to force any citizen to submit to a physical examination under such circumstances.

This is a case where Cluck was suing the railroad company for damages inflicted upon him. An application was made to the court to compel him to submit to a physical examination by physicians, that they might testify to the extent of his injury.

In the case of Messner v. Giddings (65 Tex., 309) a judgment of the district court, which had assumed to exercise authority over the estate of minors, was under review. It was claimed that the authority was given by the constitution, wherein it conferred on the district court all the powers of courts of equity.

There it is stated that the constitution of Texas does confer upon the district courts all the powers of equity. Speaking by Judge Stayton, the supreme court of Texas said, in answer to this very question, that "there is no such thing as the inherent power of a court," because that power is given by the constitution—and it was conferred by the constitution of Texas—the power of equity. But he says, as I have read before:

If it is claimed that in the court, as a court of equity, under that clause (of the constitution) the power existed, it must be replied that the district court, whether as a court of law or a court of equity, had only such power as the constitution gave it.

The Constitution has given all the powers of equity—

There is no such thing as the inherent power of a court, if by that be meant a power which a court may exercise without a law authorizing it. That clause of the Constitution empowered district courts to exercise all the power given, whether the procedure necessary to accomplish that purpose be such as pertains to a court of law or a court of equity; but it in no manner conferred upon such courts the power to exercise any and every power which at any time may have been exercised by courts of chancery in England or elsewhere.

That is what I contend for, that in the Constitution of the United States it is claimed that the language that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," confers a power that can not be controlled by legislation; and here is the constitution of the State of Texas that exactly does the same thing with reference to the district courts, and this court held that this power must be exercised according to law.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CLAY. Having yielded to other Senators, of course I can not decline to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. Did the Texas court in that case go any further than to hold that it was not inherent judicial power to require a man to submit his person to examination, and that to exercise such a power would require statutory authority? It was not obiter as to that.

Mr. McLAURIN. The court in Texas held that it was not the inherent power of the court to do that which the Senator suggests, and held that there is no such thing as the inherent power of a court, if it is meant by that that the court has power outside of the law.

Mr. CLAY. Time will not permit me to engage in any further discussion on this line. Let us briefly discuss the merits of this legislation. What are we trying to do? What is the old law? What is the evil complained of, and what remedy are we seeking to provide? The old law gives the Commission the power to ascertain what rate is reasonable and just, but of what benefit is this to the shipper if the Commission is left without power to make effective its findings? The evil consists in the want of power to compel the carrier to obey its orders. The remedy is to grant the necessary power to the Commission to compel the carrier to obey the orders of the Commission. We all agree that the Commission, under the present law, is without power to put in operation and to give effect to its findings, but can only use persuasion with the carrier to bring about a reduction of rates in accordance with its findings. Under the present law, if the Commission finds that the rate is unreasonably high it can do nothing to relieve the shipper. Power is lodged in neither the Commission nor the court to say what is a reasonable and just rate as between shippers and carriers and enforce it. I have never contended that any rate should be fixed except one that gives to the carrier just compensation for the services performed. If Congress should fix a rate itself or give to the Commission power to fix a rate that did not give to the carrier just compensation for the service performed the carrier can go into equity and enjoin such rate.

Under the common law, if the carrier fixes a rate that is unreasonably high and unjust to the shipper, the shipper has the right to go into court and enjoin the enforcement of such rate. This power has been exercised by courts of equity from time immemorial. But what substantial change will be made in the law in case we pass this bill and empower the Commission to hear the complaints of shippers or the carriers and ascertain what rates are reasonable and just and enforce its findings? The only additional power that will be given to the Commission will be the power to make effective its findings. The Commission will not be empowered to make any other rate except one that is reasonable and just both to the shipper and carrier, and one that is compensatory to the carrier for the services performed. If the Commission should abuse the power given it by Congress and fix a rate that was either confiscatory or not compensatory to the carrier for services performed, such a rate certainly could be enjoined in a court of equity. While by the pending legislation power is given to the Commission to fix rates, this power must be exercised in pursuance of the will of Congress expressed in the statute. What kind of instructions by the passage of this bill will Congress give the Commission? How must it exercise this power? Can this power be exercised either to oppress the roads or the shippers? Can this power be exercised either to wrong or injure the carrier or the shipper? Can this power be exercised in any other way than as pointed out by Congress? How can the property of any railroad be unduly injured by this legislation? The Commission is not authorized and empowered to make and enforce a rate except on complaint, and it is not authorized to reduce the rate under any circumstances, unless it be an unjust and unreasonable rate. Who will say this is not right? This power is not delegated to the Commission to in any way cripple the railroad industry of our country. It is delegated to the Commission for no other purpose except to force the carrier to do right. Who will contend that the Commission heretofore has ever attempted to exercise this power oppressively?

Have not the railroads in this country been prosperous since the creation of the interstate-commerce law? Is it not true that if this bill passes and the Commission is entitled to exercise this power, in reviewing rates, with a view of finding what is a reasonable and compensatory rate, that the power necessarily must be exercised in such a way as to carry out in every particular the express legislative will of Congress? Can the Commission fix a rate confiscatory? Can the Commission fix a rate that would prevent the railroads from making operating expenses and denying to them just compensation for the services performed? I answer, "No." If the Commission attempted to fix such a rate and put it in operation, clearly, under the law, the carrier would have a right to go into equity and enjoin it, because such a rate would deprive the carrier of its property without due process of law and without just compensation. The friends of this measure are not seeking to do any wrong to the railroads. They are not seeking to cripple and retard the railroad growth of this country. The object of this legislation is to give fair and equal treatment to every American citizen and to the carriers. The object and purpose of this legislation is to make railroads do right and to make shippers do right. The object of this legislation is to clothe a tribunal already in existence with power to settle the disputes and differences between shippers and carriers without expense to either, that no one may be wronged and that every individual shall have equal and a fair chance in transacting business with public carriers. If the contention of the Senator from Ohio be a sound one, that neither Congress, directly itself or through a Commission, can regulate interstate freight rates, then what is the situation? Indeed, a most serious and appalling one! Many billions of dollars have been invested in railway corporations paying annually more than $2,000,000,000 per year in freight and passenger fares, and under the control of half a dozen systems whose traffic managers dictate to the American people such rates as the traffic managers of these systems may think proper, and the American people are bound to acquiesce in such rates, whether reasonable or just.

Never before have I heard this power questioned until I listened to the ingenious arguments of the Senator from Ohio. If such be true, the American people ought to know it. If Congress is helpless and can not grant adequate relief, then the framers of our Constitution have not acted with that wisdom characteristic of their lives. If such position be true, the American people ought to know it, and if the courts are going to place such construction upon the Constitution of the United States, thus eliminating the power of Congress on a subject of paramount importance, then the American people ought to know it, and they will call upon their representatives to change the Constitution so as to protect the interest of the American people. If Congress is without power to regulate interstate freight rates, what, indeed, is the situation? We know the power of organized capital. With more than $10,000,000,000 invested in railway lines largely under the control and influence of a few men, they are to become the sole judges as to what burdens commerce shall bear for all time to come. Shall not the farmers, the merchants, and the manufacturers have some voice in determining what is a just and reasonable rate to be paid for the transportation of farm products and merchandise from one State to another? Shall this important matter be left entirely in the hands of the railway systems, with their traffic managers the sole judges as to what rates shall be charged? What will become of the business interests of this country with such a situation? What will such results lead to? Are not the American people to have a tribunal, clothed with ample power, to protect them against extortion? Shall the traffic managers be allowed to put in operation excessive rates, that will cripple and destroy the business interests of this country, and is the American shipper, the farmer, and the manufacturer to be left without any remedy?

Did the framers of our Constitution act so unwisely as to leave the American people without any remedy from so great an evil? Ample power, in my opinion, is left with Congress to regulate interstate freight rates, either directly or through a commission. More than half of the States in this Union have already passed statutes creating commissions or boards of transportation and providing that such commissions or boards of transportation shall have power to put in operation reasonable and just rates within the States. In every instance these acts have been upheld and are now in operation.

It is true that Congress can not deal with railroad rates exclusively within a State, but Congress has special jurisdiction to regulate commerce and to deal with interstate freight rates. Congress exercises the same power over interstate freight rates that the legislatures of the different States exercise over rates within a State, and ample power is given to the State legislatures to protect the people within the respective States, and Congress has been clothed with all the power necessary to protect them against excessive and unjust rates of transportation between the States. I am not hostile to corporations. They are essential to the growth and development of the country. They build cities, develop the value of farms, give employment to labor, and deserve equal and fair treatment with any other interest of the country, but where large aggregate wealth is practically under one control, and where corporations have been created for the benefit of the public, such corporations must be held to a strict account, and must be kept under the control and regulation of the Government in such a way as to prevent them from doing any injustice to the individual citizen.

Corporations organized and doing business exclusively within a State must be controlled by the legislatures of the States, but the States have no jurisdiction over those engaged in interstate traffic; Congress alone can regulate their conduct. It becomes the duty of the law-making power to scrutinize most carefully the conduct of corporations and to hold their officers and managers to a strict compliance with the terms of their charters. Never so much before in the history of this Government has the public realized the importance of vigilance upon the part of State legislatures and Congress in holding to a strict accountability the management and control of corporations. Public sentiment has almost crystallized on this subject, and the eyes of the American people are now turned toward the American Senate. Thoughtful men view with alarm the situation.

The conduct of great insurance corporations in the city of New York has attracted the attention of thoughtful men everywhere. These insurance companies were organized for the purpose of carrying on the insurance business, and it was the duty of every officer, director, and trustee of such companies to hold in trust for the policy holders every dollar of their surplus. The American Congress and the legislatures of the different States can not be too vigilant in probing into the affairs of corporations and in requiring their officers and managers to use the funds of the corporations for no other purpose except for the benefit of the stockholders. Every dollar appropriated by the officers and managers of any insurance company, or any railroad company, or any other corporation for the purpose of controlling either city, State, or national elections was without authority of law and against the interests of the American people. No president of an insurance company, no director of an insurance company, no trustee of an insurance company, no president of a railroad, no director or trustee of a railroad has any legal or moral right to take the funds of a corporation for which he is an officer and apply it for any purpose except the legitimate business of the corporation.

Every dollar used for the purpose of controlling legislation, or given for the purpose of aiding the candidate of any political party in any campaign, either city, State, or national, was dishonestly and corruptly used, and the rights of the stockholders of such corporation were openly violated. It ought to be an indictable offense for any president of a railroad, for any officer of a railroad, for any officer or trustee of an insurance company to take the funds belonging to the stockholders of such corporation and apply them for any such purpose. Again, corporations ought to engage in no business except that for which they were created. Recently we are told that the stockholders in three great railway systems own a majority of the coal fields in West Virginia and a large part of the coal fields in Pennsylvania. They haul their own coal in preference to the coal of the private citizen. The independent operator is left without cars because the roads are anxious to develop their own mines and to destroy all competition. Such an abuse of power deserves condemnation at the hands of Congress. It is a fact that the consolidation of railroads, which has practically destroyed competition, has produced in this country a feeling of unrest in both the industrial and political world. The business man with small means has been unable to meet his more favored competitor. These conditions ought to be viewed by Congress as a danger signal.

It has been truly said that the railway corporations, the steel trust, and standard oil have grown so enormously wealthy that they are able to dominate and control wherever they go. It has been well said that these great corporations can make or unmake property, no matter how vast. They can destroy a competitor's business in a day with their enormous wealth. They can control national campaigns, elect governors, and State legislatures. The people when aroused are more powerful than all the insurance companies, steel, and railroad corporations combined. Public sentiment is waking up to a stern reality of this growing evil. Let us give every American citizen a fair chance, and let us encourage in every way possible honest competition, under which we have grown great and powerful. We know that the item of freight becomes a great factor in the success or ruin of individuals or citizens. It has been truly said that he who pays, under similar conditions, more than his neighbor to reach the market must in the end go down in his business. A discrimination in a railroad rate affects the price of the product of the farm and factory—indeed, affects the whole scale of living. It is the duty of Congress to protect the weak against the strong and the powerful.

These common carriers were created for the public good. They get their life from the States. They must carry on their business in such a way as to do even justice to every shipper and every community, and there must be power lodged somewhere to force them to conform to this rule—such a rule that guarantees to every American citizen equal and fair treatment at the hands of railroads. Under American institutions we have guaranteed to every American citizen equal and fair treatment. We must not allow combined capital to cripple and destroy the business of the humblest citizens of the land. We are proud of American institutions. Americans have been taught that this is a Government of justice, a Government of law, where every man shall have an equal and fair chance in the race for wealth and honor. Why hesitate about this legislation? It is of paramount importance and will meet the approval of an overwhelming majority of the American people. I have followed with some degree of interest the decisions of the courts reversing the rules and findings of the Commission heretofore made, and I have read with pleasure the dissenting opinions of that learned judge, Mr. Justice Harlan, giving his construction of the interstate-commerce act, as originally drafted and passed by Congress. Mr. Justice Harlan said, in construing the long and short haul clause of the interstate-commerce act:

The Commission was established to protect the public against improper practices of transportation companies engaged in commerce among the several States.

The distinguished jurist said:

After this decision the Commission has been left power, it is true, to issue protest.

And he could have said this was the only power left it.

It has been shorn of power—

Said the learned judge—

by judicial interpretation to do anything of an effective character. It is denied many of the powers, which, in my judgment, were intended to confer upon it. Besides the acts of Congress are now so construed as to place communities on the line of interstate commerce at the mercy of competing railroads engaged in such commerce.

Then follows another dissenting opinion where the distinguished judge disagreed with the majority of the court construing the power conferred by the act of commerce creating that body relating to rates. The same great judge delivered a dissenting opinion prophetically observing that the position taken by the court might well be regarded as recognizing the authority of competing railroad companies, when their interest will be subserved thereby to build favored centers of population at the expense of the community at large. How prophetic is this language! Large centers of population have been gradually building up and similar towns have suffered, and the rural population has gradually drifted to the large centers, and a greater evil could not befall this country. The distinguished jurist said:

The Commission has been robbed of all power.

The railroads since that decision have controlled the situation and any effort upon the part of Congress to review the rates fixed by their traffic managers meets with hostile opposition. I sometimes hear it charged that the Commission does not do its duty. The Commission, in my opinion, is an able body. It has combated in every possible way excessive rates and discriminations and undue preferences. But what can the Commission do? What power has it in the premises? Under the decisions of our Supreme Court it is helpless. The railroads are authorized and empowered to fix any rate, either just or unjust, and the Commission is without any power to remedy the situation.

I hold in my hands a synopsis of a speech said to have been made by Chairman Knapp, an able lawyer and a conscientious man, that sums up the situation. Mr. Knapp said, in a speech delivered before a meeting of the Men's Club of the Assembly Presbyterian Church, March 6, in substance as follows:

This is a subject which outranks all others in importance. Why is it that the Government should be allowed to interfere with the rates charged by the railroads? In original times pathways existed; but the change from settled to nomadic conditions and the acquisition of private property made public highways necessary. The duty of providing this highway is one of the functions of government, and the individual's right to use the highway has never been questioned. The right to equal use of the public highway has been named the "political right inalienable," and the nature of this right has not been altered by the fact that commerce has moved from the dirt road to the steel rail.

Mr. Knapp said:

I consider that it was almost providential that the Constitutional Convention of 1785 declared that "the Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, between the States, and among the Indian tribes." This now stands forth as the most important clause in constitutional law, and its three great fundamental principles are that all rates shall be just and reasonable, that there shall be no discriminations between persons, and that there shall be no discriminations between localities or articles of traffic. Discriminations and rebates—originated in the intense rivalry between the numerous railway systems which came into existence soon after the close of the civil war, and it is a well-known fact that the greatest fortunes of the country have been built upon systematic, long-continued, and excessive rebates, which have enabled their owners to secure command of the markets. And to this—is due the menacing growth of the trusts. In every country—except the United States there is governmental ownership or complete governmental supervision of the railroads. The former is not yet popular with our people, but the latter is much desired. Congress can not personally supervise the railroads, but it can enact laws for their government. It can seek to preserve private enterprise and protect public welfare and to regulate railroad interests, but not to acquire them. There should be required from the railroads a sworn annual statement of the business done and a complete disclosure of their financial operations. A public statement of rates and charges should be made by them. It should be made a criminal misdemeanor to give rebates, while the schedule of rates should be made by such a body as may be designated by Congress. The vital question of the day is whether this last power should be judicial or legislative in its nature.

Said Mr. Knapp—

He adds—

Says Mr. Knapp—

Chairman Knapp says:

The total valuation of 220,000 miles of railways in this country amounts to $11,250,000,000, and their daily earnings are $5,500,000. These lines may be divided into eight large systems, as follows: The Vanderbilt, Hill, Harriman, Atchison, Pennsylvania, Atlantic Coast, Southern, and Rock Island systems. These systems—

Mr. Knapp says—

can be said to control 70 per cent of the entire mileage and three-fourths of the traffic, of the earnings, and of the valuations of the country's railroads. And it is found that a man dominant in one system is directly interested in others. Another disconcerting fact is that those who control the railroads are at the head of the steel, oil, and other great industries, as well as the great banking and trust institutions, and that all this control has a common center in New York. The real problem—

Says the chairman—of the day is far deeper than rate legislation; it is the problem of wealth control. Is the country to be governed from Washington or from Wall street? Should the wealth of the country be allowed to rule it? We must meet under modern conditions the proper distribution of wealth. We have almost settled the administrative questions of government. Can we settle the economic question before us? That is the problem.

He sums up the situation well, and this statement, made by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, whose ability is recognized and appreciated throughout the country, is calculated to cause those who legislate for the nation to act promptly and effectively.

I repeat, the decisions of the highest court in our land have settled the question that Congress can not authorize a commission to make any rate except one reasonable, just, and fairly compensatory. The decisions also settle the question that no court can rearrange and prescribe a rate to operate in the future. All the court can do is simply to decide whether or not a rate put in operation by the Commission is reasonable and just, and either enjoin it or refuse to interfere. The court can not decide what is a reasonable and just rate and prescribe that that rate shall go into effect in the future.

In the case of Smith v. Ames (169 U. S., p. 466) can be found a decision that settles the former question, which says that a State enactment, or regulations made under the authority of a State enactment, establishing rates for the transportation of persons or property by railroad that will not admit of the carrier earning such compensation as under all the circumstances is just to it and to the public would deprive such carrier of its property without due process of law and deny to it the equal protection of the laws, and would therefore be repugnant to the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

The idea that any legislature, either State or Federal, can conclusively determine for the people and for the courts that what it enacts in the form of law, or what it authorizes its agents to do, is consistent with the fundamental law is in opposition to the theory of our institutions, as the duty rests upon all courts, Federal and State, when their jurisdiction is properly invoked, to see to it that no right secured by the supreme law of the land is impaired or destroyed by legislation. The reasonableness or unreasonableness of rates prescribed by a State for the transportation of persons and property wholly within its limits must be determined without reference to the interstate business done by the carrier or the profits derived from that business. The State can not justify unreasonably low rates for domestic transportation considered alone upon the ground that the carrier is earning large profits on its interstate business, over which, so far as rates are concerned, the State has no control; nor can the carrier justify unreasonably high rates on domestic business upon the ground that it will be able only in that way to meet losses on its interstate business. A railroad is a public highway, and none the less so because constructed and maintained through the agency of a corporation deriving its existence and powers from the State. Such a corporation was created for public purposes. It performs a function of the State. Its authority to exercise the right of eminent domain and to charge tolls was given primarily for the benefit of the public. It is, therefore, under governmental control, subject, of course, to the constitutional guaranties for the protection of its property. It may not fix its rates with a view solely to its own interests and ignore the rights of the public; but the rights of the public would be ignored if rates for the transportation of persons or property on a railroad were exacted without reference to the fair value of the property, for the public, or of the services rendered, and in order simply that the corporation may meet operating expenses, pay the interest on its obligations, and declare a dividend to stockholders.

A corporation maintaining a public highway, although it owns the property it employs for accomplishing public objects, must be held to have accepted its rights, privileges, and franchises subject to the condition that the government creating it, or the government within whose limits it conducts its business, may by legislation protect the people against the exaction of charges for the services rendered by it; but it is equally true that the corporation performing such public service and the people financially interested in its business and affairs have rights that may not be invaded by legislative protection of property. This decision practically decided that a commission can not be authorized to make any rate that is not reasonable both to the carrier and to the shipper and that is not compensatory to the carrier. The decision says that the duty rests upon all courts, Federal or State, when their jurisdiction is properly invoked, to see to it that no rights secured by the supreme law of the land is impaired or destroyed by legislation.

In the case of Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (154 U. S., p. 362) the court says:

It is within the power of a court of equity in such case to decree that the rates so established by the Commission are unreasonable and unjust and to restrain their enforcement; but it is not within its power to establish rates itself or to restrain the Commission from again establishing rates.

An overwhelming line of authorities could be produced demonstrating conclusively that Congress can not empower a commission to make a rate that is confiscatory or that would not be fairly remunerative or compensatory for the service performed by the carrier in behalf of the shipper.

This bill contemplates that the rate fixed by the Commission shall be a just and a reasonable one. It is pretty well settled by the authorities that, in the event the Commission fixes a rate that the carrier thinks is unjust and confiscatory or not fairly compensatory, that the carrier can go into a court of equity and have the question determined as to whether or not the Commission has exceeded its power. Hence it may be conceded that by the passage of this bill the carriers will not be deprived of their right to go into equity and make complaint, as they have done heretofore, charging that the rate fixed by the Commission is an unlawful one and unreasonably low and not compensatory for the service performed. The court would have the right to determine that question. The rate fixed by the Commission is presumed to be reasonable and just and in pursuance of the legislative will of Congress, and ought to stand until set aside by a court of equity. So far as an appeal to the courts is concerned, existing courts are ample to guarantee all those rights.

The Commission, in fixing a just and reasonable rate, must be guided to a large extent by business principles and common sense, and our Supreme Court has laid down rules that will aid the Commission in arriving at such a rate. The court says:

The basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a highway under legislative sanction must be the fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public; and in order to ascertain that value the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value of its bonds and stock, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses are all matters for consideration, and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case.

The court says:

What the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience; and, on the other hand, what the public is entitled to demand is that no more be exacted from it for the use of the public highway than the services rendered by it are reasonably worth.

This standard ought to be satisfactory to both the shipper and the carrier. (See Ames v. Smyth, p. 468, 169 U. S.)

After mature deliberation I have reached the following con-

gestions, and my vote shall be cast to put into law these conclusions if I have an opportunity to do so:

First. I believe that ample power is conferred upon Congress to regulate and control interstate freight rates and that Congress can prescribe a standard of rates that is just and reasonable, and then delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to ascertain what rates will come up to the standard fixed by Congress and empower the Commission to put such rates in operation.

Second. Congress must fix a standard that is just and reasonable, that will give to the carrier reasonable compensation for the service performed, and empower the Commission to fix rates in accordance with that standard.

Third. That the rates put in operation by the Commission are, in effect, rates fixed by Congress, and that such rates express the legislative will of Congress, and should be put in operation within a reasonable time after such rates are prescribed by the Commission, and should remain in operation until set aside by a court on constitutional grounds, after notice and hearing, namely, that such rates are not compensatory for the services performed. I do not believe that the legislative will of Congress should be interfered with by interlocutory orders and temporary injunctions, at least without notice and a full hearing. The courts should be slow to interfere with rates fixed by an impartial and intelligent commission. This Commission represents Congress, and the rates fixed by the Commission are presumed to be just and reasonable and should not be enjoined or set aside without notice and a full and complete hearing in court. The rates fixed by the Commission are presumed to be correct and should not be interfered with until set aside on constitutional grounds. The carrier and the shipper should both be given the right to go into existing courts and have determined the question as to whether or not the rate fixed gives just compensation for the service performed. The right to review should be limited to this question. If the rate is confiscatory and does not give just compensation to the carrier, it ought to be set aside. If, on the contrary, the rate is too high and gives more than just compensation to the carrier, the shipper should have the right to have this question determined and to have the rate set aside. If the circuit court should determine that the rate fixed by the Commission is a reasonable and just one and should decline to interfere with it, the right should be given to go directly to the Supreme Court and the rate put in operation by the Commission should remain in effect until the final disposition of the case in the Supreme Court.

Fourth. Railroads should not be permitted to engage in any other business except that of common carriers. The officers and directors of these corporations should not be permitted to engage in the coal, oil, or any other business whereby such common carriers come in competition with the private citizen engaged in the same business. The idea that a common carrier can buy up timber lands, oil and coal fields, and haul its products to the detriment of private citizens who are competitors is wrong and vicious and should be prevented by statute.

These conclusions are reached after careful thought, and when put into a statute will protect both the carriers and the shippers in the enjoyment of their just rights. Such legislation will have my hearty approval.

Mr. CARMACK obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CARMACK. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I want to appeal to the Senator in charge of the pending measure to lay it aside temporarily that I may call up a bill that has been twice before the Senate, the consideration of which I am very desirous of concluding. It is the bill (S. 1529) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like very much to accommodate the Senator, but I understand the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] wishes to make a speech—a short one he tells me—on the pending measure, and I would be obliged to the Senator from Wyoming if he would withhold his request for a few minutes.

Mr. CARMACK. It depends upon how long the Senator's bill will take. I only wish to occupy a very few minutes.

Mr. WARREN. So far as I am concerned, it will take no considerable time. The duty would naturally devolve upon me to respond in some brief way to whatever might be said on the other side in opposition to the bill. Therefore I can not say how long it will take. I want to say, Mr. President, in this connection, that I realize the unfinished business is before the Senate; I realize that the Senator in charge of that bill has the right to insist upon proceeding, but I call his attention to the fact that those of us who have business in the morning hour, or before 2 o'clock, have not insisted upon even trying to proceed with that business, but have permitted the unfinished business to come up to suit the pleasure of those who wish to address the Senate. I find no fault with this, but I should feel very much obliged if we could proceed this afternoon with the measure I have in charge.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am entirely willing to do whatever the Senator wishes in this matter, but I am sort of between two friends here, and I do not know which one to accommodate. The Senator from Tennessee is compelled to leave the city.

Mr. WARREN. I understand that the pending measure has the right of way, and I will not insist upon taking up the Medical Department bill at this time, but shall do so later. I desire, of course, to yield to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] under the circumstances.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, I shall attempt no elaborate discussion of the pending bill, but content myself with a very brief statement of my own views. I do not wish to obtrude any partisan matter into this debate or to say anything that might disturb the era of good feeling which recent events have done so much to promote. When the big stick is confederate with the pitchfork, surely the halcyon days of political peace and concord have come. It is a happy omen of future tranquillity when the Senator from South Carolina appears on this floor as the special champion of the Administration's most favored measure, especially chosen for that purpose by a committee of the President's friends. Yet there is nothing at all singular or incongruous in the fact. As the Administration got its policy from the Democratic platform, it is but fitting that it should choose its spokesman from the Democratic party. Again and again has the Democratic platform demanded the legislation now proposed, and it did so in the last campaign. I am informed on most excellent authority that a similar plank was offered to the Republican committee on platform at the last national convention, and that, with vociferous unanimity, it was rejected. There was no hint of such legislation in the Republican platform or in any of the utterances of the Republican nominee for President from the first to the last of that campaign. The Democratic party alone had the courage to shoulder the responsibility for such a declaration and to encounter the antagonisms thereby aroused. But it has triumphed even in its defeat. The stone which the builders of the Republican platform rejected has become the head of the corner.

The Senator from Iowa in his very able and interesting speech says the best service the Democratic party can render is to stand on guard and see that the Republican party does right.

It is no mean or ignoble task, and I will add that it is by no means an easy one. It has often happened that the party in opposition has imposed its views upon the party in power; but when before was it ever known that a party just routed at the polls has seen its platform so soon appropriated by its victorious adversary? The Ephraimite who could not pronounce the word "shibboleth" was in a safe and happy situation as compared to the Republican member of Congress who can not swear loyalty to the Democratic platform. So, Mr. President, I cheerfully take my stand by the side of the Senator from South Carolina to perform the double duty of upholding the principles of the Democratic party and acting as guide, philosopher, and friend to this Administration.

In regard to the general object of the pending measure, Mr. President, it seems to me that its opponents have very little excuse for seeking to make it appear as a wild and perilous experiment. The power to fix rates was a power universally supposed to have been conferred upon the Commission by the act of 1887, and was exercised by that body for years without doubt or question. The Commission itself never doubted that it possessed such power, and it was only after years of experience that such a doubt was painfully excogitated by the subtle intellects of railroad lawyers. The prophets of calamity had their day when the act of 1887 was proposed; but now they stand discredited in advance. The Commission did actually wield for years the very power which now creates so much alarm, and while it did so the railroads were prosperous and the people were satisfied. The demand for the present legislation is the result of experience under the law as it was first understood and under the law as finally interpreted by the Supreme Court.

The demand for this legislation does not come from mischief-making agitators or professional corporation baiters, but from practical, conservative men of affairs who, as a class, are most strongly averse to radical changes in existing law. We have been warned that this measure will be far-reaching in its consequences. I hope and believe that this is true. I believe that in its practical workings it will remedy evils of which the people justly complain and without bearing harshly or unjustly upon the business of railroad transportation. I believe that it will remove a great source of popular discontent and that the fears of the railroad companies will prove to be nothing but horrible imaginings. If such shall be the result, this measure will be not only far-reaching, but universally beneficent in its effects. But if this measure is defeated or is craftily deformed so as to obstruct the perfect administration of the law and disappoint the just expectations of the people the consequences will be found more far-reaching, and those who now complain of radical legislation may live to see some that is radical indeed.

The necessity for effective government regulation of the rate-making power exercised by the great transportation companies of the country is, to my mind, so apparent as to need no argument. Of all the business in the country, that of railway transportation is least affected by competition. Even at so-called competing points competition has become purely nominal, and at intermediate points, of course, there is none at all. Except where it is affected by water transportation, the business of railroading is to all intents and purposes a perfect and complete monopoly. If one man possessed the exclusive right to exact unlimited charges for travel and carriage on a public turnpike or ferriage across a river or the right of passage across a bridge, the monopoly would be not more complete and the opportunities for extortion and discrimination not greater than would be possessed by any railroad company in the country whose charges are unregulated and unrestrained by law. Of all the powers possessed by government the power of taxation is the power that needs to be most vigilantly guarded and is the one most often prostituted to purposes of injustice. But no government ever wielded so great a power of taxation as that which goes with the fixing of freight charges by the great carriers of the country. There is hardly a commodity in the country that does not reach the consumer burdened with the cost of railway transportation, whether actually transported or not. We may admit, as I do admit, that the old days when the railroad companies were conducted with cynical contempt for the rights of the public and shortsighted disregard for their own best interests have passed, and that there is among the railroad managers of to-day a genuine effort and desire to promote a better feeling between the railroads and the people. But there has been no radical change in human nature. It has been said that the greatest of all devils is opportunity, and human nature, individually or incorporated, can never be trusted to forego opportunities to profit by injustice. Can we afford to leave the great carriers of this country to exercise without efficient restraint the power to tax every commodity and every product of human labor? The question, it seems to me, must be answered with an emphatic negative.

When we come to the question of means and instrumentalities through which this restraint is to be imposed I know of no better way than through a commission especially chosen for that purpose and for that alone—chosen by the Chief Executive of the nation under the full sense of responsibility which rests upon him to select men fitted by character, intelligence, and experience for the duties imposed upon them by the law.

No human instrumentality can be perfect. There will always be lapses from absolute rectitude where human nature must be relied upon, for perfection is not to be found in man, whether clothed in ermine or in homespun. I believe the very fact, so often insisted upon, that the duties to be performed under this bill are of the most delicate and important character is an invincible argument for confiding them to a body of men especially chosen for this purpose alone. I will add that in my opinion the experience we have had with the present Commission amply justifies this view. The liberal and intelligent spirit with which they have administered an admittedly imperfect law and the beneficent results of their administration have settled that question so far as my own views are concerned.

The arguments offered by the Senator from Ohio that the power to make rates does not go with the power to regulate interstate commerce, while presented with great force and ingenuity, do not appeal to me. The fixing of charges in every business affected by a public interest was an old principle and practice under the British Government and is a power which belongs inherently to every State in the Union. That power goes with the power to regulate interstate commerce which was delegated to the Federal Government. The Senator from Ohio, I believe, is the first lawyer of eminence who has ever taken this view.

Nor do I believe that he is right in contending that the conferring upon the Commission of power to fix a maximum rate is a delegation of legislative power. Without going into an extended argument, it seems to me that that question has been effectively settled by repeated decisions of the courts and it is no longer open to question.

The bill now before the Senate, though reported by a majority of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, does not come with the unqualified indorsement of that committee. It was reported with reservations, mental and expressed. The committee sent it here with all its imperfections, such as they may be, upon its head, to be beaten and hammered into more perfect form in the forge of open debate. Yet I am inclined to think that as it now stands it is a better bill than it is likely to be.

There has been much discussion here upon the question of a judicial review, if that be the proper term, of the acts of the Commission. My opinion, in brief, is that the railroad companies already possess under the Constitution all the rights that need be or can be given them by Congress. Wherever the rates fixed by the Commission are so low as to amount to the taking of property without due process of law or the taking of private property for public use without just compensation, such a rate may be attacked in the courts and overthrown. We could not, if we would, deny the railroad companies this right, and we need not, and, in my judgment, should not, attempt to confer a right which already exists by virtue of the Constitution and which we can neither abridge nor take away.

My judgment, in brief, is that we should clothe the Commission with power not only to compel the discontinuance of a rate found to be unjust and unreasonable, but to compel the substitution of a rate which it finds to be just and reasonable, and leave the railroads to their rights under the Constitution. On the other hand, there should be nothing in the bill that would seem to deny the railroads their constitutional right of appeal to the courts for protection.

I do not like the words "fairly remunerative" in this bill. They are at best a needless addition to the words of the present law, which may tend to confuse and mystify its meaning. The very fact that they have been carefully added may give them more than their proper significance. It will be an indication that Congress was not satisfied with the words "just and reasonable," which have received judicial interpretation. Just what the words "fairly remunerative" may be construed to mean or what may be the measure of fair remuneration no man can guess.

This is but a brief and hurried statement of my views upon this question. That it is a question of vast importance there can be no doubt; but that the powers conferred by this bill are radical and revolutionary it seems to me little short of ridiculous to assert. We hope to accomplish by this bill what we tried to do and thought we had done nearly twenty years ago. So far from striking out upon a new path, we are but returning to the old path from which we were diverted by an unexpected decision of the Supreme Court after we had followed it contentedly for years. The people want this law because it is right. The railroads themselves ought to want it for the same reason, and for the additional reason that a people disappointed of their just demands may become more conscious of their wrongs than of their rights, and then passion instead of justice will make the law.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, as I took part in the somewhat desultory discussion this afternoon in the time of the Senator from Georgia, I wish to add a few words in explanation of the position I then took and not with a view to elaborately arguing this bill.

As I understand, it is contended by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] that this bill practically deprives the railroads of the opportunity to attack a rate which is alleged to be confiscatory, and that the only recourse of the railroad is to deny, when the Interstate Commerce Commission brings a suit to enforce its order, that the order was regularly made; that the only issue that can be made by the carrier is as to the regularity of the order, and not the question as to whether the rate gives just compensation.

Now, that is not my understanding of this bill, and if it does mean that, it should be amended. My understanding of the bill is that the Commission is first called upon to hear and then determine; that its action is administrative, while the form of procedure is judicial; that it announces its determination and makes an order, which is not to go into effect for sixty days, and after the sixty days, if meanwhile the carrier does not bring an action to restrain the Commission from enforcing its order, the only defense that the carrier can make when the Commission brings its suit to enforce the order is that it was not regularly made.

It seems to me it is incumbent upon the carrier, immediately after the conclusion of the hearing and after the order is made, to move. It has prepared its case during the entire hearing.

it has marshaled its facts. It has presented its law. It certainly ought, within a period of sixty days, to be able to present its case to a court in equity and to obtain equitable relief, if it is entitled to it. And remember that there is no attempt made in this bill to restrain in any way whatever the full exercise of the equity powers of the court. There is no attempt whatever made in this bill to prevent the court from issuing a preliminary injunction or an interlocutory injunction if it deems it wise to do so.

Now, then, the carrier has its opportunity—sixty days within which to shape its case and present it to the court and ask for a restraining order.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think it is important, probably it is not important from the Senator's point of view in the discussion, but I suppose he means thirty days when he says sixty days.

Mr. NEWLANDS. My impression was that the bill provides that it shall be sixty days before the order goes into effect.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator has some other bill in mind, probably.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then thirty days; and I should say thirty days is sufficient, inasmuch as the carrier has already prepared its case during the hearing before the Commission.

If the carrier does not get a restraining order, the Commission can not institute its suit to enforce the order. If it does not, then the Commission can; and the only defense in that suit is as to the irregularity of the order. But the case in equity, if it is pending, goes on to a conclusion, and ultimate judgment is rendered upon all the facts presented.

I stated that the effect of almost all these amendments is apparently to enlarge the powers of the court and to trench upon the legislative discretion conferred upon this Commission. For that reason I am very cautious in considering any amendment whatever that gives a power of review. I believe that the courts will, in the future, as they always have done in the past, apply the law to the case, and that there is no danger whatever of any carrier being deprived of a remedy to which it is entitled.

Throughout the entire history of the litigation upon this subject we have never seen a time when a carrier whose rights were invaded had not the opportunity under existing law to go into the courts and assert its constitutional rights, whether in an action at law or an action in equity, and the jurisdiction of the courts under existing law has been ample to enable those courts to apply their judicial power to the remedy of any injury alleged. And I fear that in these various amendments that are proposed certain language will be used which will force upon the courts a duty not judicial, but purely legislative, and the tendency will be to substitute for the discretion of the legislature the discretion of the court.

Mr. ALDRICH. Have the courts in the past ever afforded any relief, either to the railroads or to the shippers, with respect to the evils which have been complained of?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand that the railroads contend that in nine-tenths, I think it is, of the cases they have brought attacking the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission they have been successful, and one of the indictments which they present against the Commission is that in nine-tenths of the cases presented to the courts the Interstate Commerce Commission has been wrong. Of course, in making that statement they entirely ignore the number of righteous decisions which have been rendered and which have been acquiesced in by the carriers. But the very fact that the railroads insist upon it that in almost all of the contested cases judgments have been rendered in favor of the carriers and against the Commission is proof conclusive that the courts, under existing law, give an ample remedy upon this question. So far as I am concerned, if the existing law did not give the carrier ample opportunity to vindicate its constitutional rights in the courts, I would seek to amend this bill.

With reference to this question I find that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is, perhaps, not so obnoxious as some others. Most of these amendments give the courts the right to review not only the action of the Commission regarding the rate, but all their orders relating to practices and regulations. The bill presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania simply gives the carrier the right to go into court and allege a violation of its rights. Now, I object to that phrase. I do not know what it means in legal phraseology—rights, legal rights, constitutional rights, moral rights, rights as a matter of discretion, rights as a matter of fairness, or rights as a matter of legal or constitutional obligation. It seems to me very easy, if the only purpose is to give the courts the power to protect the carrier against deprivation of its property or unjust compensation, to use language which may not be twisted into an attempt to confer upon the courts a part of the discretionary power of Congress.

I must confess, Mr. President, that I am somewhat in doubt as to the question of the delegation of power to the Commission and as to whether the bill provides a sufficient standard for the exercise of administrative power by the Commission. The standard which the Senator from Pennsylvania says is a sufficient one is a standard that the rates must be just and reasonable. I must confess that I hardly regard that as a standard. The only power that Congress has is to fix just and reasonable rates, and when it confers that power upon the Commission it confers upon the Commission all the powers that it has. It can not confer the power to fix unjust or confiscatory rates or anything but just and reasonable rates.

It seems to me, then, that the bill must be defended in this particular, not upon the ground that it fixes a standard for the exercise of a purely administrative power conferred on the Commission, but that Congress has the clear right to delegate its full power and its full discretion in the matter to an administrative board, for under this bill, in my judgment, the Commission is to exercise all the power and all the discretion that Congress has under the Constitution so far as rates are concerned.

Now, whether such a complete and ample and full delegation of power is constitutional or not I am not prepared to say, but I can not see that in providing that the rates shall be just and reasonable Congress fixes any standard. If Congress were to provide that the Commission should make a valuation of the property, and the rates should be fixed so as to yield to the carrier 4 or 5 or 6 or 7 per cent upon that valuation, I would regard it as a standard, for then the Commission would be called upon to adjust the rates so as to yield this particular return upon valuation. But there is no such provision in this bill.

I also believe that we have no right to penalize a corporation for going into court, and if this bill is subject to criticism in that particular it ought to be amended. I do not believe we have the right to burden any litigant who applies to a court for relief and to make the penalties so high as to terrorize him in the exercise of his legal rights. I am not prepared as yet to say whether the bill does that. If it does, it is clear to me that it ought to be amended.

Mr. President, I do not intend to speak at any length at this time. As I expected, the discussion thus far has been on legal lines. It is necessary that it should be. It is necessary that the atmosphere should be cleared as to these legal and constitutional complications. But I hope that at some time in the debate the Senate will come down to the economic question involved, and when that time comes I will be glad to discuss the economic phases of this question. I contend that inasmuch as interstate commerce constitutes three-fourths of the commerce of the country, and as railroads are the machines through which both interstate and State transportation is conducted, the greater sovereignty should create the machine that is to do that business rather than the lesser sovereignty; that these artificial beings should be created by a sovereignty as broad as interstate commerce itself, and that the act providing for them should also provide for their use in State commerce, with a proper regard for the police power of the States, and with a proper regard for the powers of the State respecting purely State commerce. But I believe that the corporation itself should be created by a congress, containing representatives from each one of the States affected, and I believe it is only through a legislative body of that kind that there can be had proper control over the capitalization and the taxation and the profits of such corporations.

I believe that unless we simplify the whole system of transportation in this country by frankly recognizing that railroads are inherently monopolies, that consolidation is desirable rather than undesirable, that it results in economy rather than in economic waste, and unless we create these great monopolies by a sovereign capable of dealing with them and controlling them fully and adequately, the country will endeavor to obtain some other simplification of this problem, and it will move irresistibly toward government ownership.

Now, in that connection I wish to say that I have no alarm regarding national ownership. National ownership is the irresistible tendency of the age. Outside of the United States very much the larger proportion of the railroad mileage of the world is now owned by nations, and there is not a nation that has advanced upon the work that is willing to retire from it. We have an illustration of this in Japan. Only recently, after the stress of the late great war, it has passed an act in its Parliament providing for the condemnation and nationalization of all the railroads that are now in private ownership in that country, the whole enterprise involving an expenditure of $250,000,000. I therefore have no alarm regarding national ownership, but I regard national incorporation as better, because——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Without expressing any opinion myself, as it is wholly unnecessary, I desire to ask the Senator from Nevada if he does not recognize that because of our form of government in the United States—a Federal Government and forty-five State governments—governmental ownership of railways in the United States would be far more difficult of consummation than in some, at least, of the European countries to which he has referred?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not think so, but I do not propose now to give my reasons, for it would lead to an elaborate argument. I am called from the city, and on my return on Wednesday next, if the business of the Senate will permit, I will address the Senate upon the economic phases of national incorporation as opposed to national ownership. And I will, in that connection, show the economic waste that results from our present practically uncontrolled system of transportation, with the railroads in the ownership——

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NEWLANDS. In just a moment—with the railroads in the ownership of State corporations, grown into great national systems, each railroad operating in ten or twelve States outside of the State of its creation, a foreign corporation as to those States, and practically uncontrolled regarding its capitalization and return upon capitalization.

Now I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. MALLORY. I did not exactly understand the gist of the remark made by the Senator from Nevada in reference to national incorporation. Am I right in understanding the Senator as saying that by a national incorporation act he expects to confine railroads to interstate commerce and to exclude from interstate commerce railroads that are not incorporated under the national act?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that it is not my purpose to confine the national railroads to interstate commerce, but to permit them to engage in State commerce just as the State corporations are now permitted to engage in interstate commerce.

Mr. MALLORY. It would not interfere with the interstate business of railroads that are incorporated only by the States?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It would not interfere unless Congress determined to interfere and deemed it wise to use not simply persuasive measures tending toward national incorporation, but coercive methods—such methods as those taken with reference to State banks, when a tax was imposed upon their circulation, thus practically forcing them into the national system.

Those are more details. Congress can indulge in coercion, if it pleases, and absolutely prevent these great corporations from engaging in interstate commerce at all, or it can make national incorporation so attractive by the simplicity of the scheme, the fairness of the scheme, the fairness of the capitalization, the fairness of the return, and the protection given to the property against popular clamor and popular violence that they may be gradually drawn in under the shelter of a national incorporation act. Of course in that case it would have to be done with the consent of the States. Congress can not seize upon a State corporation and force it into a national incorporation. But I assume that just as the States now by special acts permit corporations organized under the laws of other States to traverse and do business in States outside of their incorporation, the States will not seek to hamper a national incorporation, which represents not a single State, but the entire nation, when it is created by the legislative action of Senators and Representatives voicing the sentiment of every State in the Union.

Mr. President, I do not want to be drawn into the details of this question now. I give notice that on Wednesday next, at the close of the morning business, I will discuss this question if the business of the Senate will permit.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid aside for the day. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] wishes to bring a bill before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

Mr. WARREN. I ask leave to call up the bill (S. 1539) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the bill, as Senators who are interested in it will remember, has been once before the Senate and the process of bringing it to a conclusion was interrupted, so that it is difficult to take it up and consider it in a proper way without repetition. Yet I do not, for one, desire to take up the time of the Senate by going over all the matter that was brought before the Senate two or three weeks ago or more, at which time the mind of the Senate appeared to be alive to the subject. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] were interested in the bill and indicated that there were amendments which they desired to offer. They are not here now, but have been sent for. I hope they will soon appear in the Chamber, and if they have amendments to offer that they will offer them. Both the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and I have been kept here for days waiting for the deliverance of this bill, and therefore, thin as the Senate is, I think we had better go on and try to attract the attention of the few Senators who are here and finally have it submitted.

It is, Mr. President, as was brought out very fully the other day, one of the bills for the increase of the Army. My fundamental opposition to it is that I do not think now, under present conditions, the Army or any part of it should be increased. I do not think anything should be added to the burden of the Treasury by extending any branch of the Army in its operations. I do not expect in that to have the sympathy of Army men or of men who run in the direction of increasing that establishment. The province which the Army man or the naval man naturally assumes is that the Government is run for his branch of the service. I do not think that that is the popular feeling. I think the popular feeling—and I do not mean by that the popular clamor and prejudice, but the settled popular conviction—is that as we get away from any war the people of this country do not want the military establishment increased; they want it decreased. That is the rule we have always followed after every war. After the colossal conflict between the two sections of the country, the country was so tired of war that upon both sides more than a million men were sent to their homes and the establishment razed, cut down, reduced from year to year, until at last we had nothing but an Army of 25,000 men. Indian wars were upon us, but every attempt that was made then to increase the Army, either in terms applying to the whole establishment or to any branch of it, not only met no favor outside, but was defeated in Congress whenever tried.

I for one am profoundly convinced that at present, with the Army we have of 60,000 or 65,000 men, with all its branches moving in so far as I know in a proper sphere, without being crippled, it is not good legislation to increase that force either in total or in detail as will be attempted and has been attempted at the present session of Congress.

The Senator from Wyoming in charge of the bill, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, has claimed that substantially this is no increase. We went all over that the other day. All the different higher ranks are increased—the colonels from 8 to 16, the lieutenant-colonels from 12 to 24, the majors from 60 to 110, and the increase in the number of captains is large.

The committee, in order to make this proposition less objectionable and more palatable, has provided that the corps of contract surgeons shall be abolished and that a smaller number of regular officers, captains in rank, shall be substituted for them. Making figures as to what is the full pay of all the contract surgeons and the pay of the officers who are substituted for them the committee is able to make out a proposition that the increase is not large.

I called attention the other day to the fact that one, and perhaps the most objectionable, feature in the bill is the increasing of the force that in the end increases the retired list. I do not think the country and I do not think Senators appreciate the extent to which already we have legislated, and which, by act of the Department, has immensely increased the retired list of the Army.

I have here the figures showing the retired list of this Army of 65,000 men: Three lieutenant-generals, 21 major-generals, 215 brigadier-generals, 76 colonels, 70 lieutenant-colonels, 226 majors, 169 captains, and then first lieutenants, 55, and second lieutenants and chaplains between 30 and 40 more.

Mr. SCOTT. If I will not interrupt the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Maine will probably admit that the large number of retired officers in the higher grades has been brought about by an act that we passed a year or two ago permitting veterans of the late war to go on the retired list with one grade higher. That now has been virtually completed; there are no more of those veterans of the civil war to be retired. Consequently the increase will not be as great in the future as it has been in the immediate past.

Mr. HALE. Congress is not wholly bloodguiltless as to this matter of increase. It did pass in the act of April 23, 1904, a provision that—

> Any officer of the Army below the grade of brigadier-general who served with credit as an officer or as an enlisted man in the regular or volunteer forces during the civil war prior to April 9, 1865, otherwise than as a cadet, and whose name is borne on the official register of the Army, and who has heretofore been, or may hereafter be, retired on account of wounds or disability incident to the service, or on account of age or after forty years' service, may, in the discretion of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, be placed on the retired list of the Army with the rank and retired pay of one grade above that actually held by him at the time of retirement.

Mr. PROCTOR. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if substantially that same provision was not the law applicable to the Navy for quite a number of years before the passage of the act of April 23, 1904?

Mr. HALE. Yes; but it has never been worked so hard as it has in the Army.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I presume the Senator from Maine would like to complete the record. The Senator from Maine—the able chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs—successfully piloted through the Senate the personnel bill of the Navy, which provided for placing officers of the civil war on the retired list at one grade higher than that in which they served. After some years Congress took up the matter for the Army and did precisely what the Senator from Maine asked us to do for the Navy. Now, notwithstanding the figures which the Senator from Maine has submitted, the total number of retired officers on the Army list is but about 903, while the total of the Navy is about 711. Of course these figures change almost daily, as new members are added and old ones pass away.

Now, the Navy has at times been only a fraction as large as the Army; and at no time has it been, I believe, two-thirds as large. So the cost for the retired officers of the Navy is very much more than that of the Army, proportionately. It costs for the entire retired list of the Army about $2,300,000. It costs slightly less than $2,000,000 for the Navy, according to the official estimate book for the next fiscal year.

As to whether the passage of the act of April 23, 1904, was the proper thing to do or not, I leave to the Senators who are hearing this debate. In my opinion it was the least that a generous country could do for those veterans who had served in the civil war and had served since in Indian wars and in the Spanish war, to give them the advantage the Senator from Maine claimed for a part of them; and so, following his example, we all fell in line and placed the balance—that is, the veterans of the Army—on the same basis.

I might say in completing my statement that the Navy has two years' advantage over the Army, because the enforced retirement of a naval officer is at the age of 62, while that of an officer in the Army is at 64 years.

Mr. HALE. I am not here going into the question of the relative importance of the two services. I have not been wholly content with the disposition to unduly swell the naval establishment. We have a very great and powerful navy. We have, in increasing its number of ships, provided for a naval force that, when the ships now authorized and building are completed, will make what I believe is an effective, powerful, and, if need be, a destructive navy, the second in the world; not so numerous as the French navy, but as an engine of war in time of war, I believe, a superior navy to the French, and it would be so found. I hope it never will be found. It is all of comparatively new structure, built in the modern way, and with our men and officers and our gunners practiced I would pit it against any navy in the world except that of Great Britain; and it would be folly, admitted by everybody, for us to try to rival Great Britain, situated as she is, an insular power with responsibilities upon her almost everywhere that the foot of man treads.

That being the case in the Navy, I would go slow in increasing the force of that establishment, and I would only build new ships to take the place of ships that become obsolete by the lapse of time. This country is more interested in the increase of the establishment or the maintenance of a powerful navy than it is in the increase of the establishment and maintenance of a powerful army. The two do not stand on the same basis. The needs for additional men and officers in the Navy have increased every year for ten years, because we have been adding more ships. No such condition applies to the Army. There have been no conditions and no new demands as there have been in the Navy for the increase of the establishment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will indulge me right there, he is making a proposition whereby, in this great military trust of his, on which he reposes the defense of the United States, he makes the Navy the preferred stock or first-mortgage bonds, while the Army he leaves to be the common stock. Of course I do not assent to that.

Mr. HALE. That is rather a pertinent or happy illustration. I should say, if you take those phrases as illustrative of the relative importance of the two, it is about as the Senator has put it. The preferred stock is the Navy.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should think very little of the Senator from Maine, who has so successfully handled his committee and so successfully handled the Senate in his position as chairman of the Naval Committee, if he did not stand for the Navy and consider that it was better than the Army.

Mr. HALE. I do not.

Mr. WARREN. I have known a great many men to contend that their horse was a faster horse than that of any other man. I do not differ with the man as to his self-confidence or horse-confidence; I do not expect him to think otherwise; but I may differ with his judgment as to his horse. I do not consent to this common-stock Army as compared with a preferred-stock Navy. However, I did not rise to make that particular point just now, but another point: The Senator says that he is desirous of increasing the Navy——

Mr. HALE. No; I did not.

Mr. WARREN. He stated that new ships are being provided for.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Now, I want right there to call attention to the fact, in connection with the matter of retired officers, that the Navy goes further in another direction than the Army as to retirements, for the Navy forces the retirement at one grade higher rank than that to which they belong of men who have not served in the civil war, simply to reduce the number each year. In one grade forty men, in another fifteen, in another thirty-three. I am not positive as to all of the numbers; the Senator knows the exact numbers.

Mr. HALE. I have got them all.

Mr. WARREN. Yes. The naval establishment, instead of being as economical as the Army establishment is, proposes to have the best men, and is getting the best men. It proposes to force out from the Navy on each grade each year a certain number. Instead of retiring them in the grade in which they are in active service, they retire them, if I understand the law correctly, at one grade higher, notwithstanding the fact that they did not serve in the civil war, and notwithstanding the fact that they are not veterans who have distinguished themselves, but, on the contrary, that they are the worst of the lot—the Navy retiring them in that way in order to get rid of them.

Mr. HALE. That is a very small item. The trouble with the Army is that the undue swelling of the retired list is almost all in the upper ranks. I should have never agreed, if I had exercised proper vigilance—and I take to myself some reproach about it—to that provision in the act of 1904, if I had known what would have eventuated from it. We have been too much in the habit, I think, and the committees are too much in the habit, of taking the say so of the Departments that they represent, and embodying those suggestions—the say so of the Department—into law. We trust the committees, and a great deal of legislation that has been passed for the Army in the last half dozen years has not received very much scrutiny by Congress. I have not followed it as I ought to have followed it. I would not have been an intruder on this subject if I had not had my attention called—I have been pretty busy in other directions, and am not a member of the Military Committee—to the fact that there was a series of bills being reported by the Military Committee for swelling up the Army in almost every branch of it; and when I came to examine copies of those bills I found that this is true. That is the reason I am trying to do something to stem the current.

I did not have as much information when that provision crept in, but if I had known that under that wholesale promotions, with service of but one day or three days, to be followed by another pushing up, would be the result of that provision, I should never have agreed to it, although I might not have been able to stop it. It has never operated in that way in the Navy. I have not given the list, although I have the list of the higher officers of the Navy; they are not altogether many, but it has not operated in the Navy to the extent that it has in the Army. I do not want to see anything done in this Congress, if I can help it, that will swell the retired list either of the Army or of the Navy.

As against the 266 major-generals and brigadier-generals in the Army, we have now got in the Navy 103 retired rear-admirals—a very slight number compared with the Army, although the Navy has been constantly increasing by reason of the ships requiring more officers and more men. But I want that stopped.

Mr. PROCTOR. How many major-generals did the Senator say were on the retired list?

Mr. HALE. Two hundred and sixty-six major-generals and brigadier-generals, I think, is the number.

Mr. PROCTOR. And how many admirals?

Mr. HALE. One hundred and three; and I want them both restrained. I do not think it is a good feature now. I have had the curiosity to examine this bill, and I find that it provides for all these additional colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains, and so on. I sent to the Department to-day to get a list of the retired force in this one corps alone, which is to be very greatly added to if we substitute regular officers in the Army, with the retired privilege, for contract surgeons who do not have that privilege. There are to-day on the retired list of this corps alone 23 brigadier-generals, 13 colonels, 10 lieutenant-colonels, 15 majors, 15 captains, and 4 first lieutenants.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator desires to make the record complete as he proceeds. I have here a list of the retired officers of the Navy, which amounts to one more in the Medical Corps of the Navy than in the Medical Corps of the Army—rear-admirals 15, commodores 2, captains 15, commanders 9, lieutenant-commanders 7, lieutenants 18, lieutenants (junior grade) 11, ensigns 2—total, 79.

Quite a number of these rear-admirals—in fact, all of them—are receiving more pay than any of the officers of the medical staff of the Army. The total retired pay of the Navy is more than the retired pay of the Army, notwithstanding the Army is so much larger than the Navy.

Mr. HALE. That, to me, is not any answer.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. My objection to this bill is not that it is undue as compared with the Navy. I want to stop these increases in both quarters. I do not think it is the time now to increase any military establishment. I am not captious about it. Of course there will be found in the Army, just as I have found in the list I have given, an inordinate increase of the retired list in the Army of the higher officers.

Mr. WARREN. And in the Navy, also.

Mr. HALE. No; not in the Navy.

Mr. WARREN. It is because of legislation retiring those who served in the civil war; but that will soon decrease, because nearly all the civil-war veterans have been retired, while, on the other hand, grim death is constantly pressing its claims.

Mr. FORAKER. May I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. Is it not true that there is in the Navy a different system from that which obtains in the Army as to retiring officers by the process of elimination, on account of which many more officers of lower rank, below the rank of admiral, are retired in the Navy than in the Army?

Mr. HALE. I think, on the whole, it is rather a better process.

Mr. FORAKER. I think it is better; but I mean is it not true that the list was larger as to the higher ranking officers—I mean in the Army—and is smaller as compared with the Navy as to the lower ranking officers?

Mr. HALE. I was just calling attention to that fact. In the Army their process swells the upper ranks—the higher officers—and, as the Senator says, the process in the Navy is better. But, Mr. President, the expense of the retired lists of both establishments is very great.

I have been reading from some of the hearings that have been going on in the Military Committee on the Army appropriation bill. At one stage, after going into details, this question was asked by the Senator from Florida:

> Senator TALIAFERRO. What would that make the total retired list?
> Secretary TAFT. That would make the total retired list $5,900,000. If you took the lowest age at which they would retire, it would be $5,310,419.

Then he makes a comparison with the Crozier bill, as to which I do not know the distinction.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, without discussing the hearings, I will say that the reply the Senator quotes was upon a hypothetical case of what would be the result of certain legislation after a certain number of years. That legislation, however, has not been entered upon, and this bill is no part of it. The entire Army retired list at present costs about $2,300,000, and will cost less and less, notwithstanding we may pass the medical bill, because of the advanced age of a very large number of the retired officers, especially those of high rank.

Mr. HALE. Secretary Taft says:

> It would add to the cost of the military establishment, after things got down to the normal operation under the bill, $2,821,941.

That is without additional legislation by bills which are now projected and which are favored by the War Department.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the bill which was being discussed at that time is what is known as the "elimination bill."

Mr. HALE. Yes; I have referred to that.

Mr. LODGE. There were several bills, and among them was the bill prepared by General Crozier. Under his bill it was shown by his proposition as to the pay that the process of elimination would result in making no increase at all. I think it is the purpose of the bill—which, of course, has not been acted upon by the committee in any way—to endeavor to bring about what the Naval Committee intended to bring about, and that is to decrease the retirements at the very top of the list. That is what the Army system is now.

Mr. HALE. It is to increase the retirements at the top of the list.

Mr. LODGE. No; to decease the retirements at the top of the list; to retire the officers earlier.

Mr. HALE. That is the naval policy.

Mr. LODGE. Yes. That is the elimination bill that was before the committee.

Mr. HALE. But that has never been acted upon.

Mr. WARREN. The Secretary of War was before the committee of the Senate in the hearings on that measure. He did not advocate the bill there which the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. I thought that the hearings were before our committee.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; but the Secretary advocates the so-called "Crozier bill," which does not increase——

Mr. LODGE. Those are our own bills.

Mr. WARREN. They are not part of the hearings of yesterday.

Mr. HALE. I have not got those; but I have the last hearings that have been printed.

Mr. WARREN. Possibly.

Mr. HALE. I am reading from those.

Mr. WARREN. But since then, in his appearance before the committee, the Secretary takes the ground that the bill as proposed by General Crozier is better adapted for the purpose than any of the others. As the Senator from Massachusetts says, it will not increase the retired pay.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I said when the Senator interrupted me, that the Crozier bill was the one which the Secretary thought was the better bill, and I think he so impressed the committee that it would have that effect and would not add to the increase at all.

Mr. HALE. I hope, Mr. President, that will be a good result of scrutiny and of investigation. I hope the course hereafter of the Military Committee will be a conservative course. I think it is much more likely to be so than it has been heretofore. I think, without finding fault in a querulous way, that the committee has heretofore not scrutinized the plans of the Army officers closely enough and has not kept them down.

There is another feature of this bill to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate. It provides that there shall be a medical reserve corps—a corps of men appointed from the outside to get ready for war. The provision is:

> SEC. 7. That for the purpose of securing a reserve corps of medical officers available for military service the President of the United States is authorized to issue commissions as first lieutenants therein to such graduates of reputable schools of medicine, citizens of the United States, as shall from time to time, upon examination to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, be found physically, mentally, and morally qualified to hold such commissions, the persons so commissioned to constitute and be known as the Medical Reserve Corps.

There is no limitation. It is building up as a feature what I may call the "civilian branch" of the Army—the medical corps; not the fighting corps, but the doctors' corps—a reserve without limit; so that we may have before we know it a very large added civilian force in this corps to become a part of the military force.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Of course at that point the Senator will acknowledge that there is not a dollar's expense connected with the reserve corps. Its members are not entitled to retirement; they are not entitled to pay unless called into service. They will cost the Government nothing whatever. The reserve corps will simply constitute a list of officers who have passed the proper examination and who have commissions, so that in case of necessity they can be called into service.

Mr. HALE. I do not think there is any need of that.

Mr. WARREN. Whether there is need or not, it must be granted that it costs nothing and is a good precautionary measure.

Mr. HALE. I never knew of any provision of this kind, started on the assumption that it would cost nothing, that did not begin the second year of its operation to cost something, and the third year to cost still more; and when you get a reserve medical corps, taken from the outside by the President without limit, you will find necessarily some kind of duty will be arranged or provided for it, and it will begin to add to the expense. It is a part and parcel of the general scheme.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I observe in the bill that the colonels, majors, and captains in the Medical Department are to correspond in rank with the similar grades in the cavalry arm of the service. I ask the Senator why is it that the Army medical officers are rated according to the cavalry arm rather than any other arm of the service?

Mr. HALE. I am not responsible for the bill. I know why that is, but the Senator in charge of the bill, the chairman of the committee, will explain it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maine will permit me, the pay of the cavalry officers includes what is called "mounted service." It is $200 more for the young surgeon—that is, instead of a first lieutenant, unmounted, drawing $1,600, he draws mounted pay, $1,800. It simply fixes the salary of the medical officers of the rank of lieutenant at $1,800.

Mr. HALE. That is, it adds so much to what he gets now without the bill?

Mr. WARREN. That is incorrect. He simply goes into the service as a mounted officer, the same as he would go into the cavalry.

Mr. HALE. Does he not get additional pay? Do not cavalry officers have the advantage of $200 a year?

Mr. WARREN. They get as first lieutenants $1,800.

Mr. HALE. But without it they get $1,600.

Mr. WARREN. But there is no "without it" about it either in the cavalry or medical service. That is the regular pay and always has been.

Mr. HALE. That is, a medical officer must be a mounted officer?

Mr. WARREN. He must receive the pay of a mounted officer.

Mr. HALE. He receives the pay of a mounted officer.

Mr. LODGE. He has to be a mounted officer.

Mr. HALE. No; he is given the pay that a mounted officer in the cavalry has, although he is not a mounted officer himself.

Mr. PROCTOR. He is a staff officer and has to have transportation.

Mr. HALE. Well, yes; I suppose he has to have a kind of transportation, but he is not mounted as cavalry is mounted in contradistinction to infantry. The cavalry is mounted service all the time. Of course a medical officer and an officer of the pay corps must have transportation in getting around.

Mr. PROCTOR. All staff officers have to be mounted.

Mr. DANIEL. All field officers above the rank of captain are mounted in all arms of the service—cavalry, infantry, or artillery. As to lower officers, of course, there may be some difference. The medical officer, who is a captain or a first lieutenant, might also be mounted when the corresponding rank in the line was not mounted; but I presume there is some difference in pay, and perhaps that caused the selection of the cavalry as the basis for compensation.

Mr. WARREN. Right there allow me to say that a man who enters the cavalry or who enters the infantry or the artillery gets his education at West Point under pay of the United States. The man who becomes a medical officer must educate himself, and must have a diploma from some medical college or designated and accepted institution of learning for medical students. The cost to that student for his medical education runs anywhere from $1,500 to $8,000. When a man is ready to go into the cavalry he has been under pay for four or five years, and has received his later and special education in the meantime; but the man who goes into the medical service has expended a large amount of money, and his pay only commences after he has been examined and enters the service. Hence he is entitled to the higher pay, without regard to whether he is mounted or unmounted. He has earned the pay of a mounted officer. That has always been done, and is done in all armies.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly. That is not a new consideration. The Medical Corps is taken from the outside. As the Senator says, medical officers are not educated at West Point, but the Medical Corps has certain advantages, which are very great. It has promotion; it has large pay. It is also true that there are always a great number of ambitious young surgeons who are desirous of entering the Army. I have applications of that kind, and I presume every other Senator has. It is considered a favorite branch, because it is favored in various ways.

Mr. WARREN. Right there may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. As a matter of fact, what the Senator says is not exactly true in the present situation. It might have been once. While true that many applications may have been made, it is nevertheless true that since the present method was inaugurated in the Medical Corps, the flow of promotion being slight and the other inducements not great, there are not applicants enough for these places to keep the ranks full. During the last year they lost thirteen from that corps, and were only able to get four. The consequence is that the corps is not full, even with the small regular number now provided, because young men with sufficient education—and the requirements of the examination are high—to pass that examination are not willing to enter on small pay and with small prospect of promotion, when they can turn immediately to the Navy, which gives them much greater chances of promotion and which requires them to remain but three years as lieutenants before they are made equal to Army captains, while in the Army it requires five years as lieutenants. Hence the ranks can not be filled now, and there is not a large number of applicants. There are not enough to fill the ranks, because the inducements are not great enough.

Mr. HALE. I am glad the Senator has made that statement. It is a very important one; but I think it does not change in any way my statement, as affected by my own experience. I do not know how many of these young surgeons who apply are competent and are admitted; but if it is true that under the present arrangement the numbers in the different ranks in the Medical Corps are not full, it is a very poor time for legislation making the number of officers still larger. If they have not been able to get men to fill the numbers in the present grades, certainly there is no cause for increasing the number of officers in the grades that can not be filled as they are. At any rate, we had better wait until these ranks are full before we increase the number.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator knows they are now full, except at the bottom.

Mr. HALE. That is what I am talking about. That is where the young surgeons come in.

Mr. WARREN. And the reason they do not come in is because of competition with the Navy and competition with civil life and practice. There are greater inducements in other directions. What is the result? Our Army is poorly officered in this respect and we have to go out into the market and hire whom we may for the time being.

Mr. HALE. That is what I think is a very good feature. I think the contract-surgeon system, elastic as it is, is an extremely good feature. Bright young men who become contract surgeons are not obliged to be put into the regular establishment. You may have a contract surgeon for a year or two years or three years; he gets the benefit of the practice of surgery; he returns to his profession, and is a more competent and safer practitioner. It has always been with me a belief, and it is to-day, that the elastic contract-surgeon system is much better than to make every man who is appointed a Regular Army offcer with the right of retirement. I do not like the abolition in this bill of the contract-surgeon system.

Mr. WARREN. Yet the Senator does not introduce it into the Navy.

Mr. HALE. I do not need to.

Mr. WARREN. He does not even recommend it for the Navy.

Mr. HALE. There is no need to. As was said the other day, the conditions in the Navy are different.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, one is in name the Navy, and the other is in name the Army, and that is the only difference.

Mr. HALE. Take the long cruises in the Navy. Ships are frequently out for three years, or even more.

Mr. WARREN. It is just as easy to make a contract for three years as it is to make it for one year.

Mr. HALE. Yes; but that is an entirely different thing. The contract in the Army is for a period of one year. That is the beauty of the system.

Senators do not seem to take much interest in this bill, and I do not know but that the Senate is ready to vote for this increase. I propose to test it, at any rate, as I shall hereafter on any bill or any provision in any appropriation bill or elsewhere for the increase of the Army. I shall try to get the sense of the Senate as to whether this is a good time in which to do it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, my service on the Military Affairs Committee has been an extremely brief one. I went on the committee only at the present session, and I therefore speak with some hesitation in regard to subjects on which special knowledge is more or less required. I have been startled, I confess, by the magnitude of the retired list and by the practice which has grown up of taking men from lieutenant-colonels or colonels and making them brigadiers for one day's service. I have been surprised at the extent to which that has been carried, and there is legislation in a House bill which will very largely put a stop to that practice. However, I do not think that that bears directly on this bill.

The Senator from Maine represents a series of bills coming out of the Military Committee for the increase of the Army. I know only of this one, the dental bill, which was reported last year, and a bill for the increase of the Coast Artillery.

Mr. WARREN. And it has not yet been reported from the committee.

Mr. LODGE. It has been reported, but is in committee. The ordnance bill we passed, but I think it carried little or no increase.

Now, as to this bill, my experience in regard to applicants has been different from the Senator's. I think we all have applications for almost every kind of Government office, but that of Army surgeon is one of the positions for which I do not now recall ever having received an application——

Mr. KEAN. The Senator must be the lone exception.

Mr. LODGE. Except during the period of the Spanish war. Of late years I should say I have not received any applications for that service. The indications, to my mind, are that it is not a particularly popular service. We now carry it on with contract surgeons.

I disagree with the Senator from Maine that that is a desirable way to carry it on, and my reasons are these: The contract surgeon is necessarily either a very young man just out of medical school who wants to get something that will tide him along for a year or two, a man without any experience whatever, or else he is an elderly man who has failed in his profession. I do not think you get good service by the system of contract surgeons, and the House, moreover, sends over this year a bill with a large increase in the number of contract surgeons.

This bill, I understand, makes a very slight increase in the additional expense, nominal at first. Subsequently I think it will reach the amount of about $48,000 a year. The chairman will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. WARREN. At the maximum and after about six years.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; at the maximum and after about six years it will amount to about $48,000 a year, and it will give us a very much better service.

I am no more in favor of increasing high-grade retirements than is the Senator from Maine, especially in the Pay Corps and Medical Corps, and I think we have given to those corps in many respects far too much rank. But I do think that in the interest of good and economical service—I mean economy in the long run—the proposed revision of the Medical Corps for which this bill provides is wise.

I do not want to enter upon any extravagant appropriations for the Army. The Army is one of the few departments of the Government which of late years has made large reductions. Since the Spanish war it has brought the appropriation down from $115,000,000, I think, to $70,000,000. The bill this year as it comes from the House is less than it was last year, and even with such amendments as the Senate may find it necessary to make we shall not go over the appropriations of last year. The Secretary has cut the estimates to the bone. The first revision that took place by the Assistant Secretary reduced the estimates of the bureaus some $20,000,000, and then the Secretary himself cut it over $20,000,000 more. Other Senators may be familiar with all these facts. I have learned them in service on the committee.

Nothing is more obvious than the fact that the present Secretary has cut the estimates to the lowest possible point, with the result certainly that the bill as it comes from the House is less than it was last year, and I do not think as it finally passes it will be more than it was last year.

But, Mr. President, it is false economy to save money in certain directions. We have at great expense and very wisely—I think it is more essential to the defense of the country than anything else—established coast fortifications. They are not complete, but many of our great cities are now well defended, and in those fortifications are placed guns which have cost a great deal of money. They are perfectly useless unless we have men who can handle them. They are suffering from need of men actually to take care of them. It takes about six months, perhaps, to supply a soldier for the infantry and a year for the cavalry. It takes nearly two years to train a man to use those large guns; and to have these great guns unmanned and in these great fortifications useless as defense if war should come, because there would be nobody to handle them, and going to ruin perhaps from lack of sufficient care now, does not strike me as good economy.

I merely mention that as an illustration that it does not follow because some additions are extravagances which ought to be stopped that all additions are. There are some refusals of money which are more extravagant than an additional expenditure, and I think that is certainly the case and has been proved to be the case in regard to coast artillery. This matter of a medical corps is not a very serious one; it is not a very large increase, at the outside, and I think it does make for better service.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. CARMACK. I should like to offer at this time an amendment to the railroad rate bill, and ask to have it read and printed.

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee, as I understand he is about to leave town.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee proposes an amendment to the railroad rate bill, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert between sections 8 and 9, on page 26, the following:

(37) That any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company receiving property for transportation from a point in one State to a point in another State shall issue a receipt or bill of lading therefor and shall be liable to the holder thereof for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by its negligence or the negligence of any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass, and no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed: Provided, That nothing in this section shall deprive any holder of such receipt or bill of lading of any remedy or right of action which he has under existing law.

SEC. —. That the common carrier, railroad, or transportation company issuing such receipt or bill of lading shall be entitled to recover from the common carrier, railroad, or transportation company through whose negligence the loss, damage, or injury shall have been sustained the amount of such loss, damage, or injury as it may be required to pay to the owners of such property.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CARMACK. If the Senator from Wyoming will permit me, I will state that the amendment was unanimously agreed upon in committee, and I think there will be no objection to it. I should like to have the amendment agreed to by the Senate now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The rate bill is not now before the Senate.

Mr. CARMACK. Very well. I will let it go over.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3590) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there is a very great deal that I could say on the subject of this bill and that I would like to say, but rather than fatigue the Senate further, I am ready to take a vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not hear the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I simply remarked that I am ready to let the bill go to its final consideration and passage.

Mr. HALE. If no other Senator desires to speak, I will ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill. I want to see how the Senate stands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and ordered to a third reading?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass? upon which the Senator from Maine demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KITTREDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. GAMBLE (after having voted in the affirmative). I will ask whether the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. GAMBLE. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Nevada, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who, I see, is absent. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. ALGER], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GAMBLE. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], but under our arrangement I was permitted to vote. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has now transferred his pair to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], who is detained from the Chamber by illness, and I will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. KITTREDGE. As I have stated, I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON]. On account of his absence I withheld my vote, but I take the liberty to transfer the pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DANIEL. I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], and therefore refrain from voting.

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 5, as follows:

YEAS—42.

Aldrich	Dillingham	Knox	Perkins
Allee	Dolliver	Latimer	Pettus
Anthony	Dryden	Ledge	Piles

Clapp	Gearin	Newlands

So the bill was passed.

GOVERNMENT POWDER FACTORY.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask the Senator to withhold the motion for a moment, in order that I may ask consent for the printing of a letter.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2355) to organize the corps of dental surgeons attached to the Medical Department of the Army. It is the same bill——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Alabama? The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill.

Mr. HALE. What is the bill?

Mr. PETTUS. The dental bill, the passage of which the Senator had reconsidered.

Mr. HALE. No; I can not yield for that purpose.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Maine withhold his motion for a moment in order that I may have a letter printed in the RECORD?

Mr. HALE. I can not yield to anything that will give rise to debate.

Mr. DANIEL. Not at all.

Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter from a gentleman, Mr. Peters, who represents the King Powder Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio. He contradicts a statement which I quoted from Mr. Robert S. Waddell, of Peoria, Ill., in some remarks which I made a few days ago. I ask, in justice to the King Powder Company, that this letter may be printed in the RECORD, omitting three words which I have penciled out because they are an expression not necessary to the sense of the letter and of which I do not care to be the vehicle of conveyance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. CULLOM. I heard the Senator refer to Peoria. Is this letter from a gentleman in Peoria?

Mr. DANIEL. It is traversing a statement made by a gentleman of Peoria.

Mr. CULLOM. I make no objection to the request.

Mr. DANIEL. But it casts no reflection on the city of Peoria or on Illinois.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE KING POWDER COMPANY,
Cincinnati, Ohio, March 26, 1906.

Senator DANIEL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: We notice from the papers that on the 23d instant you read before the United States Senate a letter from Mr. R. S. Waddell, president of the Buckeye Powder Company, Peoria, Ill., to the effect that when some years since we were competing with the Du Pont Company for Government business on black powder, our powder not receiving fair test, we took the Du Pont powder, which was accepted, put it in our kegs, and under our label furnished it for Government test. If Mr. Waddell made such statement, we wish to say that it is * * *, nothing of the kind ever having occurred or ever having been thought of by us.

We wish further to say in contradiction of Mr. Waddell's statement, as reported, that The King Powder Company does not belong, and never has belonged, to a "powder trust," and, furthermore, that we do not believe there is such a thing in existence as a "powder trust."

Justice to both companies involved would seem to require that you give to these corrections the same publicity that you gave to Mr. Waddell's statements. If you will do so before the incident passes out of the minds of the Senate or the public, we shall be very much obliged.

Very respectfully, yours, G. M. PETERS.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 2, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 29, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REORGANIZATION OF THE CONSULAR SERVICE.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 1345) for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask that the statement be read in lieu of the report?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I ask that the statement be read in lieu of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1345) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 1, 33, 42.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 31, 32, 34, 35, 37, 38, 40, 41, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 49, 50, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert in lieu thereof:

"Class two, six thousand dollars—Manchester."

And the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 13: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu thereof insert the word "three;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert in lieu thereof the word "four;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu thereof insert the word "five;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu thereof insert the word "six;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 36: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert, after the word "Sandakan," the word "Seville;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 39: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu thereof insert the word "eight;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 48: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out, after the words "Sault Sainte Marie," the word "Seville," in line 9, page 4; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 51: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu thereof insert the word "nine;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 73: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 73, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the two last words in said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the words "one year;" and the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The statement was read, as follows:

The bill as agreed to by the conferees, and which is now submitted to the House for its approval, is substantially in the same form in which it was passed by the House, the only changes made being in the grading of three consulates and in the extension of time from six months to one year during which consuls may be designated by the President, whenever, in his judgment, the good of the service requires it, to act as vice-consuls-general, deputy consuls-general, vice-consuls, and deputy consuls.

The consulates affected by the agreement are Manchester, England, changed from consulate-general to consul; Harput, Turkey, restored to $3,000; and Seville, Spain, increased from $2,500 to $3,000.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, before that is done, I will ask the gentleman to state what the bill is.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman, I will simply state that this is the bill for the reorganization of the consular service. The Senate has agreed to all the amendments put in by the House except three. The main point of contention between the two Houses related to section 4, containing the provision, put in by the Senate, allowing the President the right to transfer consuls in the same class from one post to another. The House struck out that section, feeling sure that it would not meet the approbation of the country. In conference the Senate insisted with some force on the retention of that section, but finally yielded. About thirty amendments placed in the bill by the House were agreed to by the Senate; all, in fact, except three which the Senate insisted on, and we thought that was a very fair compromise.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What were those three?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. We reduced the salary at Harput to $2,500, and in conference restored that salary to $3,000, as fixed by the Senate. At Seville, Spain, the salary was increased from $2,500 to $3,000. We changed Manchester, England, from the rank of a consulship to a consul-generalship. The Senate insisted that it should remain a consulship.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With those three exceptions, then, the Senate came to the position of the House?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Entirely.

The conference report was agreed to.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 88, for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes, may be made the special order for Tuesday, the 10th day of April, and that it may be the continuing special order until disposed of, not to interfere, however, with appropriation bills or other privileged subjects.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent——

Mr. DALZELL. Is that the pure-food bill?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that this bill may be made the special order for Tuesday, April 10, not to interfere with appropriation bills, conference reports, or other privileged matters. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will inquire of the gentleman from Iowa what suggestion he has to make with reference to the time for debate? This is an important bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not suppose it would be competent to arrange such a matter at this time; but I will say, for my own part, recognizing it as a matter of very grave importance, in which a great many gentlemen in this House are interested, I think there should be ample time for debate.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. What time would the gentleman call ample time?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, I should say one day, at least.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. We ought to have at least three days' debate.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have no desire, Mr. Speaker, to object to the consideration of the bill, but I feel constrained to object unless we can have some sort of an understanding as to the time for general debate and the opportunity to offer amendments. In other words, I would object to any arrangement that would prevent a full consideration under general debate and a full opportunity to offer amendments. I have introduced a bill myself, and the minority have been presented on this bill, and we offer a substitute for both the Senate and the House bill. Now, I am not willing to agree to any arrangement by which a full opportunity to present that matter to the House would be prevented. I want a full understanding about it, and must have it, before I consent to the arrangement.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HEPBURN. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SULZER. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, when the bill comes up on the 10th of April, we can rely, I think, on the assurance of the gentleman from Iowa, that ample time will be allowed for debate and for amendment. I trust there will be no objection to the gentleman's request. I want to see legislation along the lines of this bill enacted into law ere this session adjourns.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, under this request the bill will be considered under the rules of the House with ample opportunity for amendment and debate. I have never known before such a request as the gentleman from Georgia presents at this time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. HEPBURN. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to say to the gentleman from Iowa that from statements made to me on the subject I think we shall desire at least four or five hours on this side. That would mean three days of debate. Now, I concur with the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Texas as far as their report goes, but I occupy the attitude of absolute opposition to this bill, always have and always shall, when we come to consider it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I am constrained without some further arrangement to object.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavor to get some other method of accomplishing the result.

Mr. SULZER. Make the motion.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, is a motion in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair this can only be handled at this time by unanimous consent.

SETTLEMENT OF LANDS IN OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which it is proper to say was received in the legislative day of yesterday, but owing to the business of the House it was not convenient to lay it before the House at that time.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 26th instant (the Senate concurring), I return herewith House bill No. 431, entitled "An act to open for settlement 505,000 acres of land in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian reservations, in Oklahoma Territory.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 28, 1906.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution in reference to the same matter and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the action of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and of the Vice-President of the United States and the President of the Senate in signing the enrolled bill H. R. No. 431, entitled "An act to open for settlement 505,000 acres of land in the Kiowa, Comanche and Apache Indian reservations, in Oklahoma Territory," be, and hereby is, rescinded, and that in the reenrollment of the said bill H. R. 431 the following amendments be made, viz:

In section 3, page 2, line 3, strike out the words "one dollar and fifty cents" and insert in lieu thereof the following words, viz: "five

...:" and at the end of the bill add a new section to read as follows, viz:

"SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Interior shall allot 160 acres of land to each child of Indian parentage born since June 6, 1900, whose father or mother was a duly enrolled member of either the Kiowa, Comanche, or Apache tribes of Indians and entitled to an allotment of land under the act of June 6, 1900, opening said Kiowa, Comanche, or Apache reservations to settlement, said allotments to be made out of the lands known as the pasture reserves in said reservations."

So that the bill as amended will read as follows, viz:

Be it enacted, etc., That all of that part of article 3 of section 6 of the act of Congress of date June 6, 1900, entitled 'An act to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Indians of the Fort Hall Indian Reservation in Idaho,' and making appropriations to carry the same into effect, which reads as follows, to wit: 'That in addition to the allotments of lands to said Indians as provided for in this agreement the Secretary of the Interior shall set aside for the use in common for said Indian tribes 480,000 acres of grazing land to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior either in one or more tracts, as will best subserve the interests of said Indians,' be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That the 480,000 acres of land set apart in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian reservations, in Oklahoma Territory, by the Secretary of the Interior, referred to and mentioned in section 1 of this act, and the 25,000 acres of land set apart as a wood reservation in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian reservations, in Oklahoma Territory, by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be opened to settlement by proclamation of the President of the United States within three months from the passage of this act and be disposed of upon sealed bids or at public auction, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, to the highest bidder, under the provisions of the homestead laws of the United States and under the rules and regulations adopted by the Secretary of the Interior, and such purchaser must be duly qualified to make entry under the general homestead laws: And provided further, That the money arising from the sale of said lands shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and placed to the credit of said tribes of Indians, and said deposit of money shall draw 5 per cent interest per annum; and the principal and interest of said deposit shall be expended for the benefit of said Indians in such manner as Congress may direct: And it is also provided, That such sales shall be subject to any leases made for agricultural purposes prior to this act, the rentals accruing after such sale to belong to the purchasers under this act.

SEC. 3. That said lands shall be sold for not less than $5 per acre, and shall be sold upon the following terms: One-fifth of the price bid therefor to be paid at the time the bid is made, and the balance of the purchase price of said land to be paid in four equal annual installments; and in case any purchaser fails to make such annual payment when due all rights in and to the land covered by his or her purchase shall at once cease and any payments theretofore made shall be forfeited and his or her entry shall be canceled. And no title to said land shall pass to the purchaser, nor any patent of the United States issue to the purchaser, until the purchaser shall have in all respects complied with the terms and provisions of the homestead laws of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby vested with full power and authority to make such rules and regulations as to the time of notice, manner of sale, and other matters incident to the carrying out of the provisions of this act as he may deem necessary.

SEC. 5. That all lands remaining undisposed of at the expiration of five years from the taking effect of this act shall be disposed of for cash under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Interior shall allot 160 acres of land to each child of Indian parentage born since June 6, 1900, whose father or mother was duly enrolled member of either the Kiowa, Comanche, or Apache tribes of Indians and entitled to an allotment of land under the act of June 6, 1900, opening said Kiowa, Comanche, or Apache reservations to settlement, said allotments to be made out of the lands known as the pasture reserves in said reservation."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas where these amendments come from—who recommends them? It is rather an unusual way of making such substantial amendments to a bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that the bill H. R. 431, returned to the House by the President on yesterday, passed the House a month ago, passed the Senate, and went to the President for his signature. The Interior Department raised objection to the signing of that bill and to its becoming a law in that form as passed by the House and Senate. They suggested two amendments. They said these Indian lands were worth more than $1.50 an acre. That was the minimum price fixed in the bill, and they asked that the minimum price be raised to $5 an acre. The land is to be sold in 160-acre blocks to the highest bidder, either under sealed bids or in the open market, as the President and the Secretary of the Interior may direct. A great deal of this land—I presume nearly all of it—will bring $5 an acre, and a great deal of it more than that, so we agreed in the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom the matter was referred, to this amendment. The other amendment was to this effect: That all of the Indian children born in these different tribes of Indians, the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache, since 1900, should be permitted to have allotted to each of them 160 acres of land out of these pasture reserves. With these two amendments the bill was satisfactory to the Interior Department and to the President and meets their approval. The matter was referred back, as I have stated, to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that committee reported this resolution embodying these two points and asked for the passage of the bill in the form that it originally passed the Senate and went to the President, with the exception of these two amendments which we now offer under the resolution sent to the Speaker's desk.

Mr. PAYNE. Did the President when he returned the bill accompany it with a veto message?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There was no message returned, except at the request of the House and of the Senate. There was a resolution passed requesting the President to return to the House this bill. It was a joint resolution. It was approved by the Senate, and the President has returned it for the purpose of these corrections, as understood between the President and the Interior Department, after full understanding of the whole matter.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to my colleague on the committee that the matter was fully considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and they have reported and placed upon the Calendar a joint resolution intended to amend this bill, and this resolution now offered merely carries out what the committee has already unanimously reported; so that the old bill, with these two interlineations, would accomplish the purpose now proposed by the unanimous report of the Committee on Indian Affairs and also meet the views of the Executive, the Indian Commissioner, and the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the measure is not before the House now except by unanimous consent, and that objection has been reserved.

The SPEAKER. It is by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has the gentleman some question to ask?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KEIFER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I may not be familiar with the history of this whole matter, but as I understand it, it is proposed now to make a law out of an old one by mere resolution, without going through the proper steps to pass an act.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him on that point?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; if he can.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. A resolution has passed the Committee on Indian Affairs, and it has been regularly reported to the House—unanimously reported—favoring the passage of these two points suggested by the President and the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman's correction is a restatement of my position. That is, after a law was passed by both Houses, signed by both the Speaker of the House and by the Vice-President and went to the President of the United States, it comes back here and by resolution it is proposed to vacate the action of the Speaker and of the Vice-President and, I suppose, of the President, and bring the measure back for amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is a point in the history of the case that perhaps the gentleman from Ohio has not noticed.

Mr. KEIFER. That might be.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And that is that the Senate and the House have both already passed a resolution asking the President to send the measure back. This does not come back with a message of veto from the President. There was a resolution of both Houses asking the President to send the matter back for this special purpose.

Mr. TAWNEY. Therefore it is not a law now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the House has acted upon it. It is not a law now.

Mr. KEIFER. I am perfectly willing that the statement should come in from the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], but it is, according to my recollection, entirely unusual after a bill has passed both Houses, has the signature of the Speaker and the Vice-President, and after it has been bandied around the White House for a while and some of the Departments, to ask to bring it back in order to whip it into shape so that they will be pleased with it when they get it up there. So this resolution is a suggestion, which, I think, is very curious; is a suggestion that by resolution of the House of Representatives, or a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, we shall vacate the signature of the Speaker to the bill, vacate the signature of the Vice-President and any action of the President of the United States, and bring it back, not to reenact it as a law, but by some resolution put something into it. I do remember, away back in the history of the Congress, that there was an attempt to pass a financial measure through the Forty-sixth Congress and before it had gotten quite through and as far along as this a distinguished gentleman on the other side of the House, since a Speaker of this House, offered a bill to repeal it before it got to be a law at all. We thought we criticised that somewhat at that time, but here is a case of trying to bring back a bill and put something into it without going through the form of passing a law such as we would have it if the bill is re-presented.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to my friend from Ohio that this may not have been a common occurrence years ago, but its has been done a number of times in recent years in order to correct defects made by the United States Congress before a bill had been signed. This is an enrolled bill now only. We did this same thing in the last Congress.

Mr. KEIFER. You propose to bring back an enrolled bill and put into it what the Congress never did put into it by the usual steps.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Congress may put in anything or refuse to put it in.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that the Committee on Indian Affairs controlling the whole matter has acted by resolution upon this matter, and it was regularly reported from that committee.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Mississippi so stated, but that did not change the character of it. I am opposed to passing a bill and in this way making new law. That might be well in some small matter. I did not oppose this bill in the House, I do not expect to; but it will have to come in in the regular way, as I am opposed to legislation in this way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman objecting to the request I made a little while ago is prepared perhaps to withdraw that objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COCKRAN. For the purpose of finding out what is going on.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair can have order, the Chair is trying to state that the gentleman from Iowa again submits a request for unanimous consent that the Senate bill, known as the "pure-food bill," be made a special order for Tuesday, the 10th of April, not to interfere with appropriation or revenue bills or other privileged matters. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa I have no objection to the consideration of the bill, and if we can have assurances—that is all we ask from him and, of course, that is all we want—that there shall be at least two days' debate upon this bill, with ample opportunity to offer amendments—two or three days' debate—that will be satisfactory to those who occupy the position of opponents to the bill. There is no disposition to make a captious objection or to prevent the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say I want to cooperate with the gentleman in securing ample time for full consideration of the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit me, then, to amend the gentleman's request?

Mr. HEPBURN. I would prefer not.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, just one moment, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is to be considered in the Committee of the Whole. It is upon the Union Calendar, and will take the usual course of matters of that kind.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been in several Congresses considered under similar requests from the gentleman from Iowa, or some other member of the committee representing the committee, and the same order has been adopted substantially in every case, and in no case, as I remember, has there been less than three days' debate, and I have no idea, from conferences with my friend from Iowa, that we will get through with this bill in less than three days, and I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Just one moment. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to yield to me.

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Having risen a moment ago for the purpose of objecting, and listening to the colloquy between the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Iowa, I did not object, because the gentleman from Georgia did; but after talking to the gentleman from Iowa, I understand that he does not oppose at least two days' general debate on this bill, confined to the bill. In other words, that he is willing for us to have two days' general debate.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt the bill will occupy two days or that there would be that length of time consumed. I certainly would interpose no objection. That is my view.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, as there might be different understandings as to that, and it might be interpreted as meaning that it be cut off at the end of two days, I will state I am opposed to the bill, and under the rule suggested by the gentleman from Iowa I believe it will take a longer time to exhaust debate on the bill.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me to amend his request by making it that we have at least two days' general debate?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman modifies his request so that there shall be not less than two days of general debate.

Mr. HEPBURN. On the subject.

The SPEAKER. On the subject.
